

EGYPTIAN SEPULCHRES

AND

SYRIAN SHRINES

INCLUDING SOME STAY IN THE

LEBANON, AT PALMYRA, AND IN WESTERN TURKEY

BY EMILY A. BEAUFORT

28386

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS IN CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY AND ON WOOD; FROM SKETCHES BY THE AUTHOR, AND A MAP

IN TWO VOLUMES

VOL. I.

~~C.114~~

916.2
Bea.

LONDON

LONGMAN, GREEN, LONGMAN, AND ROBERTS

1861

Ah-837

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY NEW DELHI.

Acc. No. 20806
Date... 17. 6. 55.
Call No. 916.2/ Bea.

TO

R. E. B.

MY FRIEND AND SISTER,

WHO SHARED IN EVERY SCENE DESCRIBED IN THESE PAGES,

AND WITH WHOSE KIND ASSISTANCE THEY WERE WRITTEN,

THIS BOOK

IS AFFECTIONATELY DEDICATED.

1883
R. E. B.
1883

P R E F A C E.

CIRCUMSTANCES having rendered change of scene and climate imperatively necessary for my sister and myself, we hastily determined, at the close of the year 1858, to leave England for Egypt, believing that we should find there an endless store of deeply interesting subjects for thought and study, unfatiguing travelling, and no society: our hopes of the two former were more than realised, but solitude is difficult to obtain on the now fashionable and crowded Nile. I had no presumptuous intention of writing an account of our travels over such well-trodden ground, but, when I found that our long residence in the mountains of the Lebanon and at Jerusalem, as well as the unusual visit we had made to Palmyra, had given us opportunities of observation that did not fall to the lot of every traveller in those countries, I could not but wish to share our experiences with the public: since that, the horrible Syrian war having fixed the attention of England for some time upon that unfortunate country, I have been glad to add my small offering towards appeasing the general desire for further information.

It is impossible for any one who has no personal experience of it, to understand the physical difficulties and impediments under which one's journals, &c., are written amidst the fatigues of such travelling: mine has had the further disadvantage of being re-written in a foreign land, without books or help of any kind: my work is, therefore, only a faithful, unornamented record of what we saw and heard;—the scholar will learn nothing by it save a few facts which I have recorded in hopes of his drawing deductions from them of which I am myself incapable. I have, in fact, written only for those who, compelled to stay at home, would fain now and again draw their chairs to the cheerful coal-fire, shut out the grey sky and dripping rain of England, and follow in fancy the footsteps of those who have enjoyed the realities of travel; with these I not only love to share my pleasure, but I earnestly trust that many may be incited to similar enterprise, by showing them with what ease and security ladies may travel even alone, in those countries which have been frequently supposed to be open only to strong and energetic men; in this hope I have endeavoured to supply them with some practical information as to routes, points of interest, &c. &c. gathered from our own experience.

The chapter on Thebes may be useful to those travellers who cannot afford time enough to study the subject for themselves in deeper and more important works: that on Ancient Jerusalem contains notices of some facts and recent discoveries which bear on the topography of the ancient City, — for which I am indebted to an able and intelligent gentleman, Signor Pierotti, Captain of Engineers in the Sardinian army, who is now Architect to the Pasha of Jerusalem, — an office which has afforded him several opportunities of studying ancient remains accidentally brought to light; the results of this study, on which he has been engaged for six years, will be found in his admirable plan of Jerusalem, published in Paris, — a small and rough sketch of which I have given upon the map that accompanies this book.

The general map is taken from Van de Welde and the recent Admiralty surveys of the coast of Syria by Captain Mansell of H.M.S. "Tartarus." I have endeavoured to give the names of places in phonetic spelling, or, at least, in spelling more in accordance with the habits of English ears and lips than the now often-adopted rule laid down by Sir William Jones, — as experience has proved to me how very rarely names so written are pronounced by travellers with even an approximation to the Arabic: and, therefore, in the hope of making my book practically useful to them, I have preferred this attempt to following the other, perhaps more elegant, but, as I have found, generally unsuccessful plan.

Valencia: April 1861.

CONTENTS

OF

THE FIRST VOLUME.

CHAP.	PAGE
I. FOG AND SUNSHINE.	1
II. REAL LIFE IN DAY-DREAMS	14
III. WITHIN THE TROPIC	38
IV. CATARACT AND FLAME	60
V. ETERNAL THOUGHT IN IMPERISHABLE STONE	78 ⁺
VI. A MODERN EXODUS "IN HASTE"	113
VII. WHERE HOMER LIVED AND SAPPHO SANG	130
VIII. THE "BEAUTIFUL GATE" OF SYRIA	158
IX. OUR MOUNTAIN HOME	184
X. OLD PHENICIANS AND MODERN DRUZES	217
XI. THE BATTLE	230
XII. LEBANON POLITICS	254
XIII. SOLOMON'S FRIENDS AND SOLOMON'S WORK	275
XIV. THE FAIR CITY	302
XV. THE QUEEN OF THE DESERT	324

ILLUSTRATIONS TO VOL. I.

MAP.

PANORAMA OF TADMOR	Frontispiece
PORTRAIT OF SHEIKH MIGUEL	To face page 330
TRIUMPHAL ARCH AT TADMOR	„ „ 359

EGYPTIAN SEPULCHRES AND SYRIAN SHRINES.

CHAPTER I.

FOG AND SUNSHINE.

A DENSE wet fog, varying from every shade of yellow to brown, which continued with few intermissions for about three weeks, and a heavy frost of ten days' duration, which, however, persuaded the fog to give us some glimpses of the sun, and enabled us to distinguish at a hundred yards off the skeletons of that black species of tree peculiar to Hyde Park,—such was our preparation for a draught of warm, delicious air, heavily laden with the scent of orange blossoms, which, exactly seven days after we left London, rushed in at our cabin window, when we dropped anchor in Valetta Harbour, at one o'clock on the morning of the 1st of December, 1858. A few hours more and we were basking in the hot sun, under the orange trees, thankful for limonade à la neige, and forgetting the black bricks of London among the magnificent marbles of the church of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, besides enjoying the cordial kindness and hospitality of our friends at Malta. Still a few days more of the same cloudless blue sky and unruffled sea, and we landed on the dirty quay of Alexandria, on the 10th of December. A boat and a janissary had been kindly sent to deliver us from the noisy crowd of loud-voiced Indian passengers, and gratify our impatience to tread the soil of old Egypt, though we only exchanged one scene of noisy confusion for another, as we were greeted by a mass of screaming Arabs, in and out of the water, tumbling and fighting over each other, to seize possession of each member of the party, for his own donkey or carriage, or his master's hotel ; and glad enough we were to mount into the carriage prepared by our stout, grave, silver-sticked janissary, and to settle into a good hotel in the Grande Place. Here we found it nearly impossible to do anything but look out of the window at the motley crowd, which filled that baking hot, sandy place, with men of every colour of skin and garment that the most vivid imagination could conceive : Arabs of every tribe in Africa, from Morocco to Egypt, and from Abyssinia and Dongola to the Delta — Syrians, Turks, Greeks, and Italians — dozens of open carriages in every degree of shabbiness, driven by black Nubians in their white gowns, called sudeyree, with some bright coloured stuff wound round the head for a turban, thrashing their fiery black steeds — strings of tall, dust coloured camels, slowly carrying their burdens of stones, winding round corners, while every one waits for the file to pass, or pushing their long necks over the heads of the passers-by—hundreds of donkeys, each with a horrid looking goat-skin filled with water on his back, the four legs sticking up into the air, with an uncomfortable dead-alive look — more donkeys still, each carrying a snow-white oval-shaped balloon, with a huge flapping canary-coloured leather boot at each side—these are women, as you may know by the unceasing, shrill, screaming chatter which comes from under the white garment (called an eezār), to which the donkey driver never seems to pay the slightest attention,—Turks, Greeks, and Egyptian gentlemen, in various degrees of semi-costume, but all agreeing in the invariable red tarboosh, mounted on fine but small horses, sometimes richly caparisoned—and lastly, handsome European carriages, always preceded by a running saïs (who is really necessary to clear a path through the crowd), dressed in graceful white robes, with red or dark blue silk sashes, and sometimes a long stick—the carriages containing ladies dressed in the newest French fashion, or in black silk hāberahs, with white muslin veils across the face, leaving nothing to be seen but large sparkling black eyes painted with khohl. As Arabs always appear to be in a violent passion when they speak, and they are endless talkers, it is not possible to describe the noise that rose to our windows from the Place, nor how harsh, shrill, and intensely guttural the various languages of Africa and Turkey sounded to our English ears.

The noise without seemed to us pretty well balanced by the confusion we immediately fell into within; ladies travelling alone were certainly a legitimate prey to the hosts (I use the word advisedly) of dragomans, old and young, experienced and inexperienced, from the master of eight or ten languages to the stammerer in all but one, natives of every country within three thousand miles, and of every degree of intelligence or stupidity, who obtruded themselves on our notice, at all hours of the day, walking into our salon, or, not finding us there, coming straight into our bedroom without knocking;

as well as cooks and waiters, each with his packet of dirty, thumbed, faded, torn letters of recommendation, which each entreated us to read on the spot, à l'instant, — all these creatures besieging us, one after another, all day and every day during the whole time we remained in Alexandria.

We found several kind, though new, friends, in Alexandria, and were induced by their advice to change our plans, and to take a boat at once, instead of waiting till we reached Cairo, which is by far the pleasantest plan; but we had fixed our minds upon securing a dragoman of whom we had heard much in England, Achmet Adgwa, and he would not separate himself from his own boat, or leave Alexandria until it was let to some one else; for the latter contingency we could not of course wait, and we therefore put an end to the hopes of all our besiegers and closed with him at once, after inspecting every boat on the Mäh'moudieh canal over and over again, until we were too glad to be obliged to decide finally. And a beautiful boat our dáhábíeh was; from first to last we thought her the best and most comfortable boat on the Nile, and only two were larger. She had six cabins: first, a saloon, fifteen feet by twelve with two divans, fitted with presses underneath them along each side, two bookcases, and a large table; four sleeping cabins, large enough to contain comfortable washing apparatus; and a good-sized back cabin, which we used as a storeroom, and a sitting-room for our maid. We had nine windows at each side of the dáhábíeh, with glass, green wooden shutters, and curtains; and plenty of shelves, cupboards, and drawers enough to house everything. We saw other dáhábíehs, the interior of which were prettier and more tastefully fitted up than ours, but none more comfortable, bright, and airy. In front of our saloon, on the lower deck, were two seats, and the table for the servants' dinner, and an enormous goolleh (a jar of porous clay used for filtering, from which the water was always deliciously fresh), enclosed in a lattice-work of wood prettily painted. On the upper deck we had a comfortable sofa on each side, and the raised skylight of the saloon made a table; there was, however, room for half a dozen tables besides. Beyond the mast, which is placed quite in the bow of the boat, the mysteries of cooking are conducted over a small stove, the sailors cooking their own food at a queer little fire made at one side of the mast, which, about twenty-four feet high itself, supported a lateen yard, 163 feet in length, slung on in a curiously clumsy manner, but which slewed about in the prettiest curves in a high wind. Our great sail was the largest on the river, and I never wearied of watching its graceful motions. There was a small sail on the little mast at the stern, and a platform over the stern cabin, where the sailors performed their ablutions at sunrise and sunset. The dáhábiehs on the Nile are all very gaily painted, and have fanciful names, which some keep from year to year; ours we chose to change, and, after much consideration, we had the words "Wandering Maiden" painted on her sides, a name, the appropriateness of which we found afforded much amusement among our fellow-travellers. We hoisted the British ensign at the stern; and a white fleur-de-lis (the symbol of maidenhood) on a dark blue ground, floated from the end of the long yard, together with a very long streamer of red and white, depending to the water, the best distinguishing mark at a long distance. This naming of their boat is an important affair among Nile travellers, and the odd fancies of people come out sometimes rather amusingly : some names have become hackneyed into cockneyism on the Nile, but certainly the "Ibis" or "Lotus" seems more appropriate as a name for such a nineteenth century affair as a dáhábíeh, than raking up the ashes of a dead Pharaoh, since the pretty white bird that still flies over the Nile is a living, though degenerate, descendant of the sacred Ibis of ancient days, and the flower is said still to grow there ; but we were rather astonished at meeting two English gentlemen floating down the river inside the mummy, gaily painted blue and red, of Sesortasen III. ! and it was truly puzzling to imagine what that long-buried hero had to do with the blood-red banner of the Cross, or the French motto that floated from his (mast-) head.

Our crew consisted of the Reís, or captain, the Mes-táhmel, or steersman, fourteen sailors, and their cook-boy ; besides which our dragoman had his own servant, a boy called 'Ali ; and these, with our cook, our own maid, and German man-servant, amounted to twenty-three persons on board our fair Maiden.

Two or three days were occupied in filling her with the stores required over and above what we had brought from Malta, and in getting the canteen, &c. in order ; but we were rather glad of the delay, that we might see the lions of Alexandria—the quays, the two harbours, Cleopatra's Needle (as it is absurdly called), and her fallen sister, and the various gates of the city, one or two of which are picturesque. Then we had several pleasant drives along the acacia-shaded roads all round outside Alexandria. Very pleasant they are, the trees forming a cool, green barrier on each side between the road and the sandy desert ; and along the bank of the Mäh'moudíeh Canal, by the pretty villas of the Alexandrian merchants, each with its luxuriant garden, throwing clusters and tangles of magnificent, gorgeous coloured creepers over the walls, such masses of scarlet poinsettias and convolvuli of all colours, with blossoms of four and five inches in diameter, so delicious and strange to English eyes. Here and there one comes to a small stone terrace built on the edge of the water, and shaded with bella-sombra or acacia trees; these are kiosks, where people come out from the city to lounge away the afternoons, smoking and drinking coffee or sherbet. One or two huge palaces are also to be seen, which presented no beauty externally; but we afterwards visited the Rās-e-teen Palace, belonging to Saïd Pasha, and built by Muhāmmmed 'Ali, which stands on the north-east side of the principal harbour, that is, on the island of Pharos, which is connected with the shore by the ancient causeway called the Heptæstadium. The rooms are furnished with divans, and ornamental tables of great elegance and richness, but all entirely European, except some fine pieces of gold and silver damask on the Viceroy's couches, the chef-d'œuvres of Constantinopolitan looms. The best thing in the palace are the parquet floors, which are of various woods inlaid with ivory and mother-of-pearl, exquisitely done, and different in each room; the palace is also worth visiting for the sake of the fine view from the balcony of the old harbour, Eunostus.

Another day we drove along the shady, sandy roads to see the Pillar erected in honour of the Emperor Diocletian, probably on his taking possession of the City of Alexandria, A. D. 296, which is vulgarly called Pompey's Pillar; and, in returning, we passed through an encampment of Bedoueen tents, which certainly did not realise any idea I had formed of them. "Black as the tents of Kedar" they were indeed, but far from

"comely;" oblongs and squares of the darkest brown and black skins of rudely tanned leather, with flat tops, and only from two-and-a-half to three feet high! Men and women, wild, dirty-looking half-naked Arabs were crawling in and out from under the tents, gathering up their dirtier rags, or attending to about a thousand donkeys, goats, and sheep, all of them nearly black, who were standing in the encampment.

Sunday afforded us the opportunity of service in the very handsome church which the Alexandrians have lately erected, a pleasure all the more valuable as many a week was to elapse before we should enter another church; it is prettily built of white and pinkish stone, adorned with arcades and pilasters, and a semi-circular apse. In the afternoon every road and street seemed filled with promenaders; but French fashion predominated to the destruction of all orientalism or picturesqueness.

At last, our preparations were completed, and we took up our abode on board the Wandering Maiden: one day more was allowed to elapse, on account of the Wednesday, a day of ill luck, on which the sailors refused to commence a voyage; but on Thursday the 16th, at daylight, we started before a good breeze, down the Mah'-moudieh canal. About five p.m. we passed through the lock at Atfeh, and were at last floating on the bosom of the grand old Nile! I shall never forget that evening, when we slipped out of the long, narrow, high-banked canal, on to the wide, swiftly-flowing, smooth river,—the low, flat banks making it seem even wider than it was, almost like a sea, and the setting sun throwing a flood of rosy glory over the horizon, gilding the mud-houses of the tarboosh-making town of Fouah opposite, resting on the palm-trees towering above the villages, and tipping the graceful white lateen sails of a score of khandjehs and little boats, going down to Rosetta. We stayed on deck till it was quite dark, enjoying the new scene,—our last, for a long time of such weather,—one or two tremendous down-pours in Alexandria had warned us of what our fate might be; but from that evening, for eleven successive days, we had constant storms of rain and wind, the rain threatening to drown us, as it leaked through deck, door, and window, and the wind making us pitch and roll, until we were nearly sea sick. Once, when looking at the magnificently blue sky in Alexandria, so new to English eyes, I made some remark to a gentleman residing there on its beauty: “Ah,” he said, “you have not learned yet to loathe this cloudless sky! We have not had one drop of rain here since the middle of last February, and you cannot understand how one wearies, mind and body, of the changeless expanse, longing for the ever-varying clouds we think so beautiful, because we so seldom see them, and because they bring us so much refreshment and vigour.” We had enough of them now, however; so much so, that to some people, our voyage to Cairo might have been tiresome, but to us it was not so. We were glad to rest after the long journey from England,—we had books in plenty,—our boat dried in the first rays of sunshine, and sometimes, when the wind forced us to lie thumping on a bank, we could manage to find a sheltered walk in the country, making acquaintance with castor oil and gum-arabic trees, cotton plants, and the ever graceful palm groves. Sometimes we examined the *shadoofs and *sakiyehs, both on the banks of the river and in the fields; or ventured into the tents and mud huts of the fellaheen (from sing. fellāh), from whence we never failed to bring away many lively and unpleasant souvenirs. The men seemed to have nothing to do, but to stand lounging about, leaving all the work of house and field to the women, whom we always found busy; they were lively and good-natured, though not by any means engaging in person or deportment. They wear but one garment, a long dark-blue gown or chemise, thrown round the body, in an untidy fashion, exposing generally the legs, always the arms, and sometimes the neck, but drawn over the head and across the face, when any one is near: their unkempt locks are thrown back and roughly plaited, their eyelids are painted black with khohl, and their grinning white teeth are set off with stripes or circles on the chin and forehead, of blue tattooing. A large silver ring stuck through the flesh of one nostril, ear-rings, a dirty silver bracelet or two on each arm, and generally one on each ankle, complete their costume, which is as ugly as it is simple. I do not think I saw two women with his head uncovered, holds a long pole balanced horizontally on a perpendicular stick, with a palm leaf or wooden basket at one end and a weight at the other end; he dips the basket into the river and then throws it up expertly, making it empty itself into a hole or trough, cut to receive it, above his head. If the bank is high, another or two more men stand above him with repetitions of the same contrivance.

* The shadoof is the very simple machine used for lifting the water of the Nile up to the height of the bank: a man, almost naked and

The sakiyeh is a huge wheel with earthen jars fixed all round it, which fill as they pass through the river, and empty themselves into a trough as they reach the top. It is turned by a couple of oxen, who pace round and round to the screeching groaning music of the ungreaed crank. This creak of the sakiyeh, with the eternal melancholy song of the shadoof men, half wail, half screech, is the true sound of Egypt: no hour nor half-hour passes without hearing one or the other, and the very name of the country brings the echo of it as distinctly into one's ears, as the remembrance of the yellow sand, or of the broad river, floats before one's eyes.

in Egypt, out of Cairo, whose appearance did not more or less disgust me. When we went near their huts they always invited us in, and generally insisted on shaking hands with us, laughing all the time, and expressing their wonder at our riches—the only reason they could devise for our putting on so many clothes one over another: and sometimes they would offer us their dhourra bread, or milk, or show us how they were grinding corn, between flat round stones, or making cheese by leaving the milk to drain through mats, made of plaited palm leaves; always asking about how they do the same things in the Howadji's country.

It is certainly a much less expensive plan to go from Alexandria at once by railroad to Cairo, and there engage your boat; since though you may reach Cairo in four days' sail, you may also occupy fourteen, as we did, and we heard of persons having been twenty-one days on the way! But at the same time you have the advantage of knowing your boat and finding out her deficiencies before you come to the last place where you can buy stores or get anything altered or improved, and you have also some amusement and pleasure in your voyage, while the line of rail is wholly uninteresting and ugly. I contrived to find something for a sketch every day, and doubtless there would have been plenty more subjects to be found with better luck than the unusually bad weather we fell in with. For a sportsman I should think the boat much pleasanter than the land journey; as game is immensely more plentiful in the Delta than above Cairo, and much less wild. The sand banks are covered with thousands of wild geese and ducks: and there are wild boars to be hunted in several localities. If, however, people are likely to weary of a long quiet voyage, it is better to go by railway, and have the dáhábieh sent up to Cairo to meet them, stipulating that it must arrive within a certain number of days. The dáhábieh is decidedly better and nicer at Alexandria than at Cairo, but also proportionably dearer.

At this time we were slowly tracking against head winds; and at Kefr el Aesh, where the railway crosses the Nile, the wind increased so much that we were moored two whole days on the east bank. On the second day, when we had lost all patience, and, in spite of our dragoman's remonstrances, were going to insist on making an attempt to shoot the opening left in the bridge now building for the railway, an unexpected ally came to hand: the superintendent of the station, Ismaen Effendi, — may his shadow never be less! — arrived in a well-rowed boat alongside, saying, that on hearing there were English ladies on board, he had come to see if we stood in need of any assistance. He assured us that it was quite impossible to shoot the bridge, unless by the chance of an exactly favourable wind. "But," said he, "you English people always want to eat dinner together on your Christmas-day, and you must be in Cairo for that, — I will give you two hundred men to pull you through, if you like it." Of course we gladly accepted so obliging an offer, and while his men went off with his orders, the Effendi sat chatting in very good English with us, sipping his coffee and smoking his shibouque. He told us he had been educated at King's College, London, and afterwards lived a year or two in Kent, and that the English had been so kind to him, and made him so happy, that it was an especial pleasure to have an opportunity of assisting any English person who came to his country. The Effendi has since, I believe, left this station.

His pleasure was, however, frustrated: for, just when the men were all ready, the wind, which had been unsteadily bearing about for the last hour or two, suddenly settled into the precisely right point, and blew us through the opening with the Effendi on board, and all the two hundred workmen standing ready to assist on the bridge, gesticulating, screaming, and shouting quite as much as if they had really been doing the business themselves.

Our good friend sent us in the evening some excellent milk and turkeys: on one of which, in consequence of the still unkind and cruel winds, we made our Christmas dinner, moored under a palm grove in the hot sun, the turkey stuffed with pistachio nuts and dates, and a "plum-pudding" of biscuit, citron, and dried apricots.

Two days afterwards, as I was watching the rich hues of the setting sun upon the sands and trees, I saw two small triangles, distinct and hard, on the western horizon, which my heart suddenly leaped up to greet — there stood the Pyramids at last! I saw them many times afterwards, in various ways and at various times of day, but they never impressed me more than on that evening, painted in the exquisite lilac hues of sunset, yet golden tipped, over the straight, flat green bank of the river, far away over line after line of sand — far away, standing up, straight and clear against a background of coloured clouds

CHAP. II.

REAL LIFE IN DAY-DREAMS.

WE landed on the west bank, before we reached Boulak, on the morning of the 29th of December, scrambling over a forest of dirty boats to make our first essay upon the Arab saddle of Cairo donkeys: the latter are most excellent of their kind, as lively as they are small, and the saddles are not uncomfortable; they are simply cushions mounted high on the donkey's back, with a round hump across them in front, and they are generally made of gay red leather, while the saddle-cloth is worked in colours with bands of cowrie-shells sewn on in strips: a charm, enclosed in a triangular silver box, is hung round the animal's neck.

Our road, which lay along a high causeway shaded with fine trees, brought us into the Esbeykiyeh, at the Shoobra corner, close to Shepherd's Hotel (where we entered the name and distinguishing flag of our boat in the Nile Howadji's book), and then went on to the English Consulate, and into the Turkish bazaars to buy sugar, sweetmeats, &c., which we wanted in the dáhábíeh.

Shall I here confess the truth? that my first view of Cairo absolutely disappointed me! In our second visit, when I became better acquainted with it, I learned its full beauty and interest; and now we constantly wish that we could return there to gratify the unsatisfied feeling of not having had enough of its charms; but just at first,—whether my expectations were too highly exalted, or that one reads the result of every traveller's enthusiasm after they have had time to enjoy it, and to think about it,—whatever it arose from, I certainly was disappointed with the poorness and raggedness and want of all handsome solidity in the houses of Cairo; the gay wares in the wooden shops of the bazaars are bright enough, but the shops themselves are of rough, unpainted boards, uneven in size and height, and covered in from the sun, with only ragged old palm-leaf mats, torn bits of carpet, and broken planks, “rags of rotten wood,” which give one a feeling of squalor, perhaps all the more mesquin from its contrast with the variegated hues, like a brilliant flower-garden, of the crowd below. Then the contrast is continued between the wooden and mud-built houses, and the beautiful public fountains; the water, enclosed in circular walls, roofed over with a sort of dome, flows into brazen mouth-pieces placed in compartments of exquisitely carved stone work, divided by pilasters of coloured marbles, with gilt capitals, and borders of Arabic in gilt letters, recounting the names of the benevolent Pashas who built them; sometimes (but these are almost always in the courts of the mosque) they are fountains open to the air, when they are surrounded by a marble trough, with a wooden roof supported by pillars, very gaily painted, but tattered, torn, and dirty, under which the Moslems perform their ablution of face, hands, and feet, all day long. Nor do the mosques strike one at first as handsome on the exterior; the high flat walls are unrelieved by window, column, or any architectural ornament, save one invariable line of cornice along the top of the wall, formed of simple pendentives of three bricks in the upper row, two bricks in the second, and one brick below these; simple as it sounds, its effect is very pretty, and even rich looking. The mosque walls are always coloured in horizontal stripes of red or brown paint, roughly daubed along the courses of the stone, and it is wonderful the lively and handsome effect produced by it.

The Esbeykiyeh is a very large irregular shaped "Place," planted with a pleasantly thick wood of orange, acacia, and many other trees intersected with walks, and dotted round with wooden kiosks for the enjoyment of coffee, lemonade, and narghilehs; the houses round the broad road might make the Esbeykiyeh handsomer than any European Place, had any two of these buildings uniformity in height, colour, or kind; but they are so different, and mostly so shabby in exterior, that one loses all idea of the Esbeykiyeh being the Grand Place of a great city. Shepherd's Hotel and one of the pasha's palaces, occupy nearly all one side, but they are both of them ugly and common-looking buildings.

But whatever may be its shortcomings, when one's brains have become a little accustomed to the din, bustle, and noise of the streets, Cairo is essentially beautiful and excessively charming; it seems as if one could never weary of the endless, ever-changing sights and sounds of the multitude who throng its ways (street is too western a term for them); a thousand times brighter and gayer than the Grand Place at Alexandria, which seems tame after a single street of Cairo.

Let us stand aside for ten minutes, while this fine

old fellow with a snow white beard, white and gold turban, a purple silk robe, and dark red trowsers, lays down his long shibouque, and weighs out for us an oke of delicate rose leaf confiture (having first held out a little dig of two or three kinds on the end of his finger, for us to taste!), and watch the crowd pushing by our donkey. This bazaar is for groceries, and the shops are heaped with loaves of sugar of every hue except white, and palm-leaf baskets of dates, dry and fresh, nuts of all kinds, spices, roasted Indian corn, figs, olives, and innumerable sorts of dry sugar-stuff, pink, brown, yellow, and white, in sticks and lumps, which the Arabs are always eating; they are thoroughly nasty to our taste. Every shop is tenanted by a figure, rolled up cross-legged on the counter, in parti-coloured robes and white turban, smoking and chatting (or screaming rather) to their fellow-shopmen; while the donkey boys in their dirty, ragged, blue cotton shirts, and other idlers, sit down to rest on the edge of the booth, and join in the conversation right merrily. The way is quite full, and the beggars demanding "Baksheesh, howadji! baksheesh, ya sitt!" push by you as they go; while every second minute, a ragged Arab jingles his brazen cups, and offers you fresh water out of a black goat-skin which he carries under his arm, or a sherbet-seller bends down before you, while the brass jar at his side spouts forth a stream of sweetened water or lemonade into a cup, for which you pay two or three parās, if you wish to taste its sickly sweetness. A blind man is sure to stumble over you, and a dozen women, entirely enveloped in white wrappers with a couple of holes for their eyes, stop to peep up under your hat, or to feel the texture of your dress, while you are intent upon inspecting that Bey or this Effendi, going by on a fine chestnut horse, with a saddle-cloth splendid in gold embroidery, himself in bright coloured silks, satin, and cloth, smoking his long pipe as he goes,—or this Turk of high degree, on a tall white donkey, whose bit and bridle are strings of gold cord, hung as thickly as they can hold them, with heavy gold sequins, and whose saddle is of cherry-coloured velvet embroidered in gold and pearls. You are bending forward to look at the jewels on his sword sheath, when you suddenly see a camel's ugly nose just over your own, and you start back while he lazily pushes on, flattening you to the wall with his huge burden of green fodder, or stones, or bales of calico. In another minute half a dozen men, carrying on their shoulders a deal box, daubed over with red paint, saunter by, chanting a discordant song, and your donkey boy looks up with a grin, and says, "Dead man in there;" and you turn away to decline a quantity of sweetmeats in smoking hot pastry, suddenly thrust up to your mouth by a boy in rags, trying not to seem to see or hear the score of brown hands thrust out on whichever side you move your face, while the owners scream out "Baksheesh! baksheesh!" till you are glad to move on, though every third person assails you with the same wearying word as you pass.

We stayed in the bazaars till we were perfectly bewildered, and were glad to go back to our dahabieh, which had in the meantime moved to the palm-grove opposite Cairo, leaving the rest of our shopping to be accomplished on the following day, when we had the pleasure of making acquaintance with the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Frankland Hood, who kindly offered to "keep company" with our boat, as we were strangers, and they were spending their fifth winter on the Nile. We moved on a little way the last day of the old year, stopping at sunset opposite the island of Rhoda, and looking back at a view that few things of the kind can surpass. The vast city, studded with graceful domes and still more beautiful minarets, rises up loftily from the flat, monotonous surrounding Desert, partly placed on and partly backed by the bold white Mokhuttum cliffs, while, at a little higher elevation, the Mosque and Tomb of Muhammed 'Ali, with its white alabaster walls, dark blue roofs, and delicately slight minarets, stands, like a watchman guarding the city; in the foreground, the river-bank is lined with large palaces, some white and some red, adorned with graceful arcades and handsome balconies, each with its own garden and orange-grove, meeting the gardens of Old Cairo and Rhoda. The forest of boats, of every size and form, with brightly painted masts, red and blue awnings, flags and streamers, form a gay fringe to the wide grey river. On the other side, far away over the fields of green crops, and the wide expanse of desert sand, the Pyramids raise their grave, calm, solemn triangles, cutting against the cloudless sky, clothed in strangely beautiful sunset colours of violet and gold, all too gorgeous for any paint-box to depict.

We were joined the next morning by Mr. Hood's dahabieh and another; on the following day we overtook a third; while a fourth joined us two days after. The five boats made quite a pretty little fleet; and during the ten days that ensued of slow tracking, we found plenty of amusement in efforts and stratagems to outstrip each other; this, however, is against all ideas of propriety among the crew, and our Reïs invariably apologised to the other Reïses at sunset if we had gained any advantage over their boats during the day; rather exasperating to our feelings when we were chuckling over the accomplishment of a quarter of a mile beyond our neighbours. It is amazing how these great dahabiehs do get on in the tracking; although they get aground twelve times in a day, yet they absolutely float on in safety, when the men are walking all round them with the water reaching only just above their ankles! and sometimes so close to the banks, that one may touch the trees from the decks! they carry no ballast, in order to keep them light, and they require a directly fair wind to sail tolerably. We thought ourselves singularly unlucky in the strong head winds, which blew perseveringly for ten successive days after we left Cairo, fearing that any long detention below Thebes would render our reaching the Second Cataract impossible under our three months' contract for the dahabieh. Our own boat was very heavy in tracking, though she outsailed all the others, and we were naturally anxious to benefit all we could by her virtues. Delicious as this Egyptian life was, we could not bear to think of being disappointed of seeing Nubia; and so we fretted from day to day about our progress, very unnecessarily as it turned out, and were not a little annoyed at our being obliged to put in at Beni Souef for provisions, while the rest of the little fleet took another passage for the sake of a short cut: but a favourable breeze sprung up in the night; we sped on, and in the morning could only just distinguish some of the red and white streamers of our disappointed companions behind us. The Florence, however, caught us up the next night, and we sailed on gallantly, with the pleasant little excitement of racing each other, and enjoying the scenery of long, low mountains of rugged shapes, at some distance from the river,—blue and purple by day, pink and golden in the evenings, under the ever-cloudless sky. We passed Minyeh with its pretty minarets and gardens—it is one of the prettiest towns on the Nile; and reached Siout on the 15th of January.

Siout is chiefly remarkable for its many miles of roads, lifted up above the reach of the inundations by wide causeways; they are shaded by trees, and give one a fine idea of what can be effected by persevering labour. Beyond the town, which is thoroughly amusing with the oriental life in its good bazaars, are the catacombs of the ancient Lycopolis, the City of the Wolves: they are very extensive, excavated in the side of the Libyan mountains, with high vaulted roofs, and the walls covered with figures and hieroglyphics, which are, however, so much faded and defaced as to be nearly indecipherable: one vault is still pretty, with gold stars thickly painted on a bright blue ground. They are worth a visit, from their size, and as the traveller's introduction to hieroglyphics; but perhaps the labour of mounting is best repaid by the very fine view seen from the entrance to the largest catacomb (called the Stabl d'Antar by the natives). The town, with its twenty-six minarets, stands in a rich plain of meadow, intersected with canals, and shaded with lofty trees; as far as the eye can reach, north and south, it is all the same bright and beautiful green, but on the east it is bounded by the broad Nile; while beyond that is the yellow desert to the foot of the Arabian mountains, fading away in the blue distance.

We rode back through a pretty Mooslim cemetery; each tomb, arched over in stone or stucco, and shaped like a huge bolster, stood in its own plantation of acacia trees, and frequently a fountain, for the benefit of weary passengers, is added to the little building; most of the handsomer tombs being walled in and roofed over. The wind was blowing a gale, and the sun was very hot,—so hot that we were right glad to get back to our shady cabin, although during the night before and the night after, the thermometer showed some slight frost! The mornings, indeed, till an hour or two after sunrise, were always very cold and fresh until quite the end of the month; but the cold is never disagreeable, even when the thermometer is alarmingly near 32°. Travellers, however, should always be provided with warm clothing, although after half an hour of sunshine one forgets one has ever been chilly.

My idea of the Nile, before I came to Egypt, had always been of flat, shallow banks, and a palm-tree or a mud hut here and there, such as it is in the Delta: I was therefore most agreeably surprised with the beauty and variety of the banks after Siout, which I, for one, never wearied of watching. On one side or the other there are always hills at no great distance from the river bank; sometimes the Libyan chain, in various tones of grey, shading into lilacs and purples at sunset, advanced on the western shore, or receded into delicate blue distance; more often the Arabian hills mounted up in cliffs, sometimes very boldly and grandly out of the water, leaving only a strip of castor-oil plants or a narrow track for passengers. And their colour was always so charming: a peculiar rosy yellow, more nearly resembling—if I may be allowed to use a very unpoetical simile—fresh Cheshire cheese than anything else I know, which forms the prettiest contrast to the fresh cool greens of the banks, and to the glorious gentian-blue sky, darkening in the strongly marked lines of stratification, and in the abrupt, rugged ravines, into indescribably rich shades of colour: the cliffs too are dotted all over with caves cut out of old by the monks of the Thebaïd. Though I thought them beautiful on first landing in Egypt, I came to love the graceful palm-trees more and more every day: singly, or in groves, they are always lovely and elegant, and even the most matter-of-fact mind could scarcely help indulging, I think, in a day dream of fairy land delights, while reposing in the pleasant shade of a grove of fine palms, waving in the cool sunset breeze.

Then the villages, though entirely built of mud, are not ugly as seen from the river—for the Nile mud is of a rich brown yellow, which glows in the sunshine and looks rich in the shade; and the flat-roofed houses are often topped with white stones in a way that makes them look something like fortifications from a distance: each village has scores of tall dovecots, the mud walls of which are striped with whitewash, and thatched with Indian corn-stalks: they are quaint and almost pretty objects, while the minarets are always more or less elegant: these and the palm or acacia groves, with the endless variety of picturesque groups in bright-coloured costumes, white turbans and long pipes, form a constant succession of dissolving views passing into one another, with some fresh and interesting, though always changing charm as one glides slowly by.

A complete change, indeed, from all European commonalities is this river life—the proximity of those around one is so strange and new at first;—not as on board ship, where the confusion of loud and inharmonious voices only gives one a sense of discomfort and isolation: whereas here the voices are close to one, by day and by night, with only a thin plank or a glass between, yet are neither inharmonious nor disturbing; then the faces, are not merely individually strangers, but of an unaccustomed kind: while the scenery changes all the accustomed current of one's ideas with the many new interests and new sights on each side, leaving scarcely a trace of one's former self, or of the every day thoughts that have been one's companions for years past: you scarcely realise what you were and where only three or four weeks previously, until the silent darkness of night, hiding the engrossing sights of the present, enables you to think back into the past; even then, the water trickles, gently singing, past your pillow—Mooslim prayers are heard whispering on the other side of a plank, within a few inches of your ear—Arab snores come from un-English noses—jackals squeal, shriek, and howl on the shore—and one starts up to peer out of the window, so strangely close to one's face, whence one sees wild-looking Arabs crouching round a crackling fire of dhourra sticks, and the glorious clear moon shining through palm trees, unlike anything one has ever seen before but in the fairy land of a bright dream.

As we every day improved our Arabic by a few more words, we soon began to try to string them together into sentences: these we bestowed chiefly on our Reïs, Abu Nour by name (father of the light), and they invariably afforded him the greatest delight and amusement. Our Reïs—who was as good as he was handsome, unlike nearly all the other Reïses whom we saw sitting, smoking, or sleeping all day long, and only giving an occasional order with slow and solemn gravity, seldom doing anything themselves—was up and about from daylight to dark, and all night too, if we were sailing, seldom taking more than an hour's sleep, and even then having one ear open for every sound of difficulty in the management of the vessel: and what he did, he did with an active energy, very different from the sailors, who seemed only to move each muscle exactly as little as they could possibly help; while he was always flying about here and there and everywhere, scrambling like a cat up and down the rigging, and dashing into the water, clothes, turban and all, pushing the dahabieh from the shore or shoals, guiding the little felucca with the towing rope, which he often held in his teeth while his hands were employed in rowing or dragging the vessel athwart the stream by his own powerful strength, always with the same merry laugh and happy face, and a joke or an affectionate slap for each one of his sailors, who seemed to be all as fond of him as soldiers are of a successful general. Sometimes he assembled them in a group, and gave them a solemn lecture or a scolding with uplifted hands. Then when an hour of quiet sailing came, with no sudden turns of the river, and a tolerably deep channel, they would collect on deck at the stern, lying or lounging round him while he laid aside his pipe, and with all the eloquent gestures of the Arab recounted to them some adventure, or told them a long story which elicited rapturous applause: and sometimes we used to laugh too, his face was so infectiously merry, and the changes of his voice so expressive; but their greatest delight of all was when I sketched his portrait, or that of one of the sailors,—how eagerly they came to see it, and then how merrily they laughed over the grinning brown faces and white turbans on the paper, telling me approvingly it was ~~stark~~ "keteer," or "quiyis," (very good and pretty), and then each one begging to be drawn too. Sir G. Wilkinson says, "that no modern Egyptians, of any rank, can understand pictures;" but our experience every where was of the liveliest interest in all we showed them: our Reïs would point out immediately which of my portraits was most like, and would catch at the accident in the dress or attitude for the sake of which I had taken them : while of the passing dahabiehs or kandjebs which I sketched almost daily, he was always ready to point out any want of proportion, or to detect what ropes I had omitted, or how the sails had been changed when we had passed too quickly for me to seize them accurately. A friend afterwards photographed him for us : but Abu Nour had specially prepared himself in his gala attire—a very handsome one it was, of Damascus silks and embroidery—and he was grievously disappointed at finding his rich dress metamorphosed into one dull grey colour : even the gilt frame did not reconcile him to the shadowy picture, and whenever he saw it afterwards he always signified to me how much he preferred my rough, coloured sketches. He sat like a statue to have it done, only rolling his eyes in a way that made them come out no how in the photograph : and when it was finished he was allowed, as a reward, to put his head under the curtain of the photographing instrument : I was standing in focus at the time, and it was worth anything to see his face of astonishment and hear his “Mashallah ! Wullah !” when he saw me standing upside down ! he was too intelligent to think it magic, but I am sure he made many a long story about it afterwards. How much I wish I had still any sketch of him, in his beautiful white and coloured silk vest, his long khaftan of rich brown satin bound with black braid, his white turban embroidered in yellow silk, and over all the wide blue cotton shirt, which was his badge of Reïs-hood. He was physician-general also to the sailors, and bound up their scratches or gave them their physic, whenever any little accident took place, as tenderly as a nurse (though, to be sure, the Arabs have barbarous remedies for their maladies—such as dipping a cut finger into boiling oil, and setting fire to gunpowder on a wound); and we always saw him go to comfort any of them when they were in trouble, giving them affectionate squeezes, or shakes, or long consolatory conversations.

Achmet told us that the Reïs was under a vow of virtue, which bound him to abstain from all lies or dishonesty, or from using bad words—to have but one wife, and to take no notice of any other woman, &c. &c., and that he had kept it most religiously, punishing himself by two or three days of rigid fasting and abstinence from smoking (a terrible privation to an Egyptian), if he had failed by any shortcoming: and no one could be more steadily exact in the performance of his prayers, five times every day, during which, except occasionally in the telling of his beads, which is only a rapid repetition of the name of Allah, he seemed to be absorbed in the most earnest devotion. Some people object to this and call it fanatic, but we felt it far more satisfactory and pleasant to have the services of a conscientious man, acting steadily up to his own light, even though that light was darkness.*

* I hope I shall not be misunderstood by using the word darkness, to wish to characterise the religion taught by Muhammed as darkness, save in comparison to that clearer light of Christianity which has been given to us in revelation; the Mooslim knows not Christ as God, and therefore, however far he follows the light that he has, it will not bring him to the foot of that Cross, wherefrom, as a glorious privilege of the sons

Christ, we have received complete salvation; he knows but in part, and can but see through a glass darkly; but in as far as a religious Mooslim has sought after God, be sure he will have found Him—"he who seeks Me shall find Me," saith the Lord; and He is near to all that call upon Him, yea, all such as call upon Him faithfully. It is shocking to hear those Judo-Christians, whose hearts are full of anything but the infinite Love which alone unites us with God (the Love which loves goodness before all), condemning to eternal damnation all those who, not knowing the law of Christ, yet have "showed the work of the law written in their hearts," who have "done by nature the things contained

Our pleasant course was now varied for two days with sandstorms, which, to use the mildest expression, are very particularly disagreeable: we moored for one afternoon, because we could not see 300 yards before us, but the wind lulling at sunset, we sailed on slowly by the light of a magnificent full moon (such moonlight as one has in Egypt!) until we neared "the mountain," of which the Nile sailors have so much terror, Jebel es in the law" (Rom. ii. 14); who have striven with self-discipline and self-restraint, with fastings and with prayer, with earnest humble sincerity, to keep the truth as they knew it,—are they to be eternally punished by a God of justice (not a God of vengeance) for not keeping a law they knew not? or, rather, is there not to be "glory, honour, and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile?" These unchristian Christians, who believe themselves far more enlightened than the inquisitors of old who condemned both body and soul, turn away their eyes from what is good, because, forsooth, it is not dressed in the costume in which alone they choose to see it, and which they call religion; as if good feelings, and purity, and self-denial, and devotion to a Supreme Being, when made the ruling principle of life, are not religion, even though the man who acts up to them may never have heard the name of Christ,—an incomplete religion, indeed, but true in its own integrity, whether it be of Osiris, or of Bouddha, or of Muhammed; strangely different is this from the announcement of the angel to the heathen Cornelius, "Thy prayer is heard;" and from the "truth" that St. Paul learned from the divine vision, that "in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him." "Faith," says one of the clearest-minded among our modern divines, "is no new, strange, peculiar power, supernaturally infused by Christianity alone," but the essence of Divine nature, implanted in every immortal soul (which may indeed be choked), without which we could have no part in the eternal salvation promised by God to all who serve Him faithfully, and without which our life can never be "hid with Christ." In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ; when the Pharisee, who kept the law by the letter, and thanked God he was not as other men, "shall be humbled;" and the Publican, who kept the law by his heart, "shall be exalted," the God-fearing earnest Mooslim may be found ready for the wedding-garment which the proud, unloving, so-called Christian will seek for on his own shoulders, and will not find there.

Zaïd; it is a very wicked mountain of sudden blasts and gusts, that make one's sails seem bewitched, and which baffle the most expert of crews. Gliding on smoothly, with the wind behind us, it was startling to be suddenly seized with a violent blast ahead, and the great lateen sail in an instant reversed with a shock that sent one's books spinning off the tables; but we held on steadily, the Reïs calling up every sailor, and himself taking up a perilous situation on the long yard, where no one else would venture; while Achmet stood watching and counting the minutes between the blasts, and as each one came whizzing past, saying his prayers with a very remarkable rapidity, and calling on the Sheihk es Zaïd, the Mooslim saint to whom the mountain is dedicated, to assist us out of the difficulty. Achmet counselled mooring, but we insisted upon trying to proceed, until finding that in four hours we had not made a yard, we gave it up at midnight, remaining on deck, however, for the amusement of watching the five dahabiehs of our little fleet, whom we had not seen for two days, and two or three native boats, come sailing smoothly up in the bright moonlight, unconscious of what was awaiting them, and calling out to us to know "what we were stopping for," while one after another each was seized by the blast, and taken aback, and we heard the exclamations of astonishment and wrath proceeding from each. We left them all behind early the next morning, passing pretty Negādeh in a sandstorm that filled eyes, mouth, and nose with unpleasant pertinacity, descending upon one suddenly, like a December fog in London, obscuring everything in a thick brown cloud, penetrating everywhere; we came into Luxsor on Friday morning, the 21st, but, alas for our racing triumphs! the second, by one hour, of our little fleet, for the Selima had passed us in the night, and we had only the consolation of hearing that the three other boats were "nowhere;" we had been ten days doing the seventy-seven miles between Cairo and Beni-Souef, chiefly tracking, and now we had sailed the three hundred and seventy-eight miles between Beni-Souef and Thebes in only ten more.

We expected great delight in our first view of Luxsor and Thebes, but the river was already too low, and Karnak must be seen in detail first to be appreciated at a distance: nor could the Sitting Colossi of the plain be seen at all. We had determined to follow Sir G. Wilkinson's advice, of seeing the temples of Nubia before examining Karnak, and accordingly devoted ourselves to the bundle of letters we found awaiting our arrival; but an invitation to join a party going to see Karnak by the light of a full moon, such as we then had, was not to be resisted, and we started at 8.30, six of us on donkeys, attended by sailors and donkey boys ad libitum to guard us from jackals, and headed by the obliging "British Consul" Mustapha. The more fortunate chance would be to have a fine moon after becoming well acquainted with the plan of the ruins; but even under this disadvantage of seeing what we did not properly understand, it was a scene that impressed itself upon the mind for ever: the deep black shadows concealing much of the brokenness and decay, and the splendid light illuminating, with a sort of tender glory, the massive columns, immense pylons, and slender obelisks; by this light it was only and altogether beautiful and lovely: one needs the sunshine and blue sky to bring out the stupendous proportions of these unrivalled ruins. Perhaps few spots on earth could be more solemnly beautiful than the centre aisle in the Great Hall, with the six gigantic columns between the sixtyone attendant columns on either side, the moonlight lighting up the open clerestory of delicate tracery against the dark sky, turning the obelisk at one end of the aisle, ninety-two feet high, into a silver needle, rising with a stern grace against the ruined temple behind it; and at the other end, illuminating a single column, standing alone in the centre of a vast square, between giant pylons and huge walls, with its capital complete, its shaft uninjured, seeming almost livingly sorrowful in its loneliness.

The howling of the jackals gave a wild dreariness to the scene, but we very unwillingly remounted our donkeys and turned back towards Luxor, through the avenue of sphinxes, which, broken and defaced into almost shapeless masses by daylight, became impressively grand by moonlight: what must have been the magnificence of Karnak, when all these splendid avenues of sphinxes were still perfect in their mighty limbs, leading up to the still more magnificent walls!

At midnight we glided smoothly on, feeling on the morrow as if one needed rest after even that slight view of Karnak, and glad to fall back into the quiet sameness of Nile life; a sweet calm monotony it is, but yet a monotony of pleasant little changes—dream-like and hazy, but a waking day dream, without the sudden, kaleidoscope changes of a sleeping dream. From day to day, from night to night, you sail calmly on, watching the golden and rosy-tinted mountains advancing or receding on either side, offering, indeed, but little variety of form, yet of colours so lovely, that I think no Egyptian travellers say half enough about them; the same brown villages with their minarets and dovecots, and their luxuriant acacia groves; the same ever varying, yet ever graceful palms; the same picturesque Arab boats, with their burdens of dates, cotton, or donkeys; the same wide, smooth, rapid river, dark brown in one's hand, yet blue in the distance, a deep grey blue, contrasting finely with the invariably bright and cloudless sky, which is broken only by the flocks of birds, who, hour after hour, rise whirling and wheeling in the air in gracefully curving lines—vultures flying singly at intervals like minute guns—millions of wild geese and ducks—hoopoes, hopping about on the banks, with their handsome brown coroneted heads—zikzags, with their pretty black and white plumage—the snow white ibis, like a winged star, dazzling in the sunshine—more rarely, rosy lines of lovely flamingoes, worth coming a long way to see: and from first to last the tiny black and white “Solomon's bird,” with its yellow cheeks—the robin of the Nile—hopping about the deck, picking up crumbs from one's hand, and saying all manner of pleasant things with its little graceful nods.

Dreamy too is the Nile life, because we see then with our real eyes the scenes we have all thought of till we fancy we have already seen them; now, in flesh and blood, yet dreamily still, they stand before us—Joseph talking to his brethren in the field, or the sons of Jacob journeying with their asses and their sacks of provender to buy corn in Egypt—Boaz sitting at the gate, and saying, “Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here!”—the two women grinding at one mill, and the unmuzzled ox treading out the corn—Rebekah carrying her pitcher on her head, or “letting it down upon her hand” to give drink to the wayfarer—Rachel coming out at even to water the flock—and the blessed Virgin Mother sitting on the ass, holding the young child in her lap, while Joseph, staff in hand, leads them on.

No one seeking much excitement or any exercise beyond walking, should come to the Nile; for it is altogether dreamy and calm: you look on at life ever moving before your eyes,—you hear ceaseless sounds of men on the banks, women washing at the river's edge, melancholy Arab songs droned out, donkeys continually braying, and the hoarse scream of the wild geese over your head—but you yourself lie dreamily and silently on your divan, and see it all pass by like pictures in a diorama; and yet one never feels shut up or inactive, for you know you are moving on and on; everything changes around you each hour, and all the while your mind wanders away—now, to the far south before you, where you fancy you must come at last to the younger days of the great river you have been passing up so long—then back to the tideless sea, into which you saw him pouring weeks ago—now, among the nineteenth century of travellers like yourself—then back to the countless generation in the almost infinite history of Egypt; and so you look up at the everlasting hills, on each side of you, that stood there, already old and time-worn, before the faintest light dawned on historic truths or even poetic fables that your furthest-seeking perspicacity can discover,—and you are so weary with the long search, that you only care to lie still and think.

Then, slowly and silently, down sinks the sun, and evening closes round with a delicious fresh sweetness, which you must cross the Mediterranean to feel; the boat is generally moored early to the bank, where the sailors light a fire of Indian corn-stalks, and immediately fall asleep in every imaginable and unimaginable attitude around it, or in heaps on the deck: voices of prayer come from the next village, until all is hushed, but the howling and whining of dogs and jackals, and generally half-a-dozen frogs holding an evening gossip, in stentorian croaks. A few hours after, you hear the Reïs' beads pattering on the deck as he kneels at his prayers, and with the first rosy glow on the beautiful starry sky all the crew are up, and the sails are hoisted, and the flags stream behind you; or the men jump ashore, and your pretty boat goes lazily thumping along the bank, as the file of sailors pull her slowly on, only stopping to make a rush at some neighbouring sugar-canes, which they greedily devour all the day after, or, to buy the more important "lebban" (milk), for your own breakfast.

Perhaps, the sound most peculiar to Egypt, rivalling even the groans of the Sâkiyah and the Shadoof, because it is so often close to your ear—is the "Hay-a-lee-sâh! Hay-a-lêe-sah!"—(the emphasis on the last, or last but one syllable, according as the action of the moment is quick or slow)—sung by the sailors in chorus; a sound which I shall always consider, however rough in itself, as some of the sweetest music I have ever heard. I never got a satisfactory explanation of the words: our dragoman told us that Leesa was a daughter of the Prophet, whose aid they invoked; but I do not know whether this is true or not; sometimes, but seldom, they called on other saints,—usually only in some locality especially dedicated to a dead saint, whose wely was in the neighbourhood, or to some Fakir or hermit living there; and sometimes of an evening the sailors would sing a long descriptive song, the translations of which were always very vague indeed. It is pleasant to have a good singing crew, but they are generally engaged for Pashas' private boats, and if your own is a very small boat, you are apt to wish a crocodile stuck in their throats before they have half done a long song; but if you keep their singing within bounds, it is sweet and harmonious, and an agreeable break upon the monotony of the downward drifting.

We met with but one instance of dishonesty on the Nile among the sailors: we left our things lying about all day, both in the cabins and on the deck—we dropped small coins on the floor—we were out whole days, leaving the Reïs in charge, though any of the cabins might be entered by the windows, unseen from the others, and we never missed so much as a pin; every single thing was picked up and brought back to us with a simple straightforwardness, that showed it was their natural habit to do so: I heard the same from everyone else on the Nile; your dragoman may eat up your stores—the rats may abscond with your dearest treasures—and the mice may breakfast on your new English gloves—but with the sailors you are perfectly safe.

We reached Esneh in twenty-four hours after leaving Luxsor, the only incident of the day being an ineffectual effort to capture a crocodile; but the wary monsters, though lying asleep on the spit of a sand-bank at least half a mile long, wakened at the first step of a man on the other end, and after one or two yawns and stretches, waddled down into the water.

The bank at Esneh was very gay and crowded; we were amused with seeing the costumes of the Ghawazee or dancing girls, generally a bright cherry-coloured silk robe, quite long, only just showing a pair of loose, pink gauze shintyān below, their heads covered thickly with gold coins strung together into a kind of cap, and a white gauze veil thrown over all. They wear quantities of gold coin necklaces and other ornaments, but we never saw a single really pretty face among them; some seemed to be only eight or ten years old.

We had the good fortune of meeting here Mr. Harris, the Egyptian antiquary, and his amiable daughter; and they were so kind as to accompany us to the Temple, and to read some of the hieroglyphics to us. The portico of this temple has been excavated, leaving the rubbish as a wall of its own height beside it, so that you descend into it from the level of its capitals; though comparatively modern, having been built in the times of Tiberius and Trajan, it is well worth seeing for its massive elegance (an expression which can only be realised in Egyptian architecture), and for the harmonious symmetry of its proportions; it is pleasanter, too, to study than most of the Temples, as it is walled off from the town, and you can sit enjoying your sketch in perfect silence and solitude: the stone of which it is built is of a rich yellow-brown, that tells well in a picture. We afterwards walked in the orange-groves of the Kashef (or governor's) palace, the Kashef himself paying us a visit in our dahabieh; he made himself as agreeable as any one can do through the medium of an interpreter, even though Achmet was a first-rate translator, and gave us a good deal of information more interesting than that in the conversation between the Pasha and "the Member for Mudcombe," famous in Eöthean annals. He descanted largely upon a map of Egypt, quite proud of being able to point out each place, though he could not, of course, read the names, and he criticised my drawings as freely as a drawing-master. He afterwards sent his daughter to see us, but we were unfortunately on shore when she came, and he was much disappointed at her not being able to see the novel, and to him incomprehensible sight of a hareem belonging to nobody, travelling in blissful liberty by itself on the Nile!

Our crew had a soirée in the evening, and entertained us with deafening music and dancing; the latter, which consists only of placing the body in awkward attitudes, bending backwards, and balancing upon bent knees, is as ungraceful as possible; and we were thankful when they were pleased to desist from the noisy darabooka (drum), clapping of hands, coffee and pipes, with which they amused themselves till ten o'clock: we sailed on an hour afterwards, determining to allow no more balls in our dahabieh. The mountains became more varied in form as they changed into the sandstones of Jebel Silsilis, and the cliff on which Koom Ombos stands so finely; but darkness came upon us, and we saw no more till we reached Assouān at 10 P.M. on the 26th of January, forty-two days after leaving Alexandria.

CHAP. III.

WITHIN THE TROPIC.

"Oh, mighty Jove!

Forgive this monstrous love for a barbarian,
That knows not of Olympus!"

OUR eyes opened the next morning on a gay and pretty scene; instead of the yellow hills and smooth sandbanks of Egypt, strange, black, shining rocks popped up in the very middle of the stream—an old Saracenic wall or fortification stretched down to the river's edge on the north, as if to shut out Egypt from our sight—while in the narrow channel between the east side and the green island of Elephantine, four dahabiehs besides our own were moored,—the Arrow and Nenna, the Gertrude and the Pharaoh,—and the Pasha's steamer, which had towed up Lord Dufferin's boats. The high sandy bank was shaded with palm trees, and covered with gaily saddled donkeys, riding camels, tame ostriches, and crowds of Nubians offering spears, daggers, bows and arrows, pieces of ivory and sandal-wood, ostrich-feathers and eggs, silver bracelets, clay cups and vases, savage-looking necklaces and head-dresses of shells, strips of rhinoceros and hippopotamus hide, leopard skins, mats and baskets of dates, for sale.

It was tempting to linger among them, but we had business to settle; besides which, a ride, our first ride in the desert, was more tempting still. Achmet had been to see the Sheikh of the Cataract, and learned that he was already engaged to take three boats up before our turn would come, and he stoutly refused to take up any dahabieh as large as the Wandering Maiden in less than two days; we might therefore expect to be detained five days at least before we reached the other side of the Cataract: and in returning we knew very well that she would be, proportionably to her weight, slower in descending the river. So we determined to see if any boat was to be had above the Cataract, and accordingly we started early in the morning for Mahatta,—a Desert ride of an hour and half. But what a different Desert from one's nursery imaginations! the flat expanse of yellow sand had no place here,—two or three hundred yards of white sand, strewed with white stones, with banks of stones and lumps of granite piled up loosely on each side, as if "put away" by giants playing at bricks and suddenly called home to supper,—strange, fantastic shapes, sometimes like cairns, sometimes like walls, chiefly white, and yet shading into delicate hues of lilac and pale grey, with now and then a dash of purple. Solemn and stern it looked, seeming to close down upon one's heart with an almost tangible pressure as we journeyed on, the only living things in the whole way, save one hyena and some black and white vultures, slowly sailing to and fro, some keeping watch while others picked at the bones of a dead camel, which it required no vulturine organ to scent at a good distance. A wely of some Sheikh was the only sign of man, save the remains of an ancient wall, or dyke, built by the Romans, some say, or by an Egyptian queen in the days long gone by. After leaving Assouān, the road commences with a cemetery of the most ancient converts to Mahommedanism, with very small stone slabs, bearing inscriptions in Cufic writing — a pretty elegant character. Many travellers have sought to carry away one of these slabs, but the people of Assouān will in no wise consent to part with them, even for the handsomest of baksheeshes.

The village of Mahatta looked more tropical than any we had as yet passed; it was neat and flourishing, every cottage having its enclosure of dôm palms, and its heap of gathered dates for sale or winter consumption; it was swarming with coffee-coloured children, destitute of any clothing save a leathern girdle or a shell necklace. Achmet fought a way for us through the crowd, and we descended to inspect an Arab boat, climbing over slippery, perilous rocks afterwards to the bank opposite Philæ, where two of the Reises of the Cataract, (there are eight of them) followed to make a bargain for its hire. In two minutes a cane divan was placed under a huge shady sycamore, two or three carpets and mats laid on the divan, for us; and then the bargaining began. The two Reïses were perfectly black, with the woolly hair, negro nose, and turned-out lips, characteristic of Nubia; each wore only a white cotton shirt tied round the throat, without sleeves, floating out in the wind from their tall black figures, polished and shining with castor oil; very fine they looked, standing gesticulating with Achmet. In about twenty minutes coffee was brought to us, and when the Reïs received the empty finjans from our hands, he made a salaam, and Achmet said, "He says, Now you have drunk his coffee, you have stepped upon his back, so he must let you have the boat for the price you say;" while meantime the other Reïs opened the bosom of his dirty gown, and poured out a quantity of dates into our laps, along with a platter of roasted Indian corn, of which we duly eat before the bargain was concluded by shaking of hands and fresh salaams.

We ended that day with a row up to near the foot of the Cataract, to enjoy the indescribable sight of that confusion of rocks, thrown about as if by hand, piled up and smoothed by the rushing water, shining and lustrous as coal and marble; the only two colours, the jet black basalt, and the red porphyry, ornamented here and there with the vivid green of the little sont (mimosa) trees.

The Desert looked strangely gay the next morning, as we followed the same route from Assouān to Mahatta, for all the occupants of the six dahabiehs then moored together were on the same route, as well as four camels loaded with the furniture and provisions for our kandjeh,—beds, basons, baths and baskets, all piled up in confusion on the swaggering camels, while, hanging out over the top of one of them, a great wooden sofa, painted green, went wagging ludicrously along. Our friends bade us adieu with a ringing cheer on the beautiful banks of Philæ—ever lovely Philæ; and we sailed gaily on at 2 P. M. into Nubia, with eight of our own sailors under a Nubian Reïs. Our new boat looked hopelessly unpromising and dirty, but we determined to make the best of it; and having made her look as nice as her old boards would permit, we gave ourselves up to watching the lovely scenes through which we were passing.

It is Egypt no longer, but something wholly different: the river seems to run more rapidly in its far narrower channel, and is of a deeper, clearer grey; the rocky hills rise more abruptly on both sides, leaving on each bank only a narrow strip, but a few yards wide in many places, sometimes not even that, gay and bright with the vivid green of young lupins; then a fringe of palms, dôm palms, or castor-oil trees, a yard or two wide, and the dark red rock rises immediately behind them, or the sand of the desert closes upon the green, as if sternly saying, "Thus far, and no further!" And thus it is throughout Nubia! scarcely anywhere does the cultivated land extend a quarter of a mile in width. Often the rocks tumble down in heaps into the water, scarcely a village is to be seen, and but very few of the people, only occasionally one or two working singly among the lupins; a silence, almost deathly, reigns throughout the land; and the whole country seems, by a subversion of ideas, to consist of the river only — a snake-like kingdom of blue water set in green and yellow enamels. The boats with their singing crews are all gone, — the birds have stayed behind in Egypt, — there are no villages for the jackals to howl in, — and the only sound that breaks upon the listening ear is that of the creaking sâkiyahs and shadoofs at intervals.

And yet, such is the beauty of the scene, that Nubia is not melancholy; and so delicious is the air, that breathing seems in itself a pleasure. The balmiest European summer's evening is raw and cold in comparison with the perfection of those Nubian nights; scarcely even cool, yet with nothing of the oppressive heat of the day, the evening air moves round one with a soft, sweet freshness, as it bathes every sense at once in a dreamy, but not languid feeling of pleasure, and charms sight, taste, touch, and hearing with equal enjoyment. We afterwards found two or three mornings, about sunrise, quite cool, but during our stay in Nubia the nights were always the same, bringing, as Eliot Warburton expresses it, a sort of conviction that existence is a blessed thing.

Not, however, that Nubian existence by day is particularly inviting : very black and very oily is the Berber, and your olfactory organs shrink from the wind that blows from him to you ; wild and fierce are the men, noisy and naked the women, and, in contrast to the resplendent polish of their skins, unpolished is their manner. One girl tried to snatch rudely from my hand a dôm palm nut I had gathered, while her companion threw handfuls of sand at us : but we were taking a long walk, with only the protection of one sailor, and had we gathered as much of their slender provision as its equivalent in England, the British peasant would probably have expressed his disgust quite as significantly and perhaps more disagreeably.

One word more of our nights in Nubia: when we entered our boat at Mahatta we found her reeking wet throughout the inside : " She's been sunk all night, ma'am, to clear out the vermin," was the explanation we received ; and, relying on Sir G. Wilkinson's assurance of the purity of Nubia, we thought only of rats, and asked no more about it. That night we slept in peace ; the sunshine of the following day, however, dried up the old boat into its normal condition ; but, in the bliss of ignorance, we retired to rest, when, after a few minutes' slumber, I awoke with a kind of impression that the imps of Sheitan had got hold of me. Oh horror ! inside and outside of my mosquito curtains files of bugs were promenading — late suppers, fit for imperial bugs, were being imbibed all over my neck and arms,—and when, with more than usual contortions, I had struggled out of my Levinge's bag, I saw on beds, walls, ceiling and floor, only bugs — bugs — bugs !! In Syria, you can buy tiny little scraps of the Koran, folded up in highly ornamented silver, or gaily worked leather bags, which are worn round the neck, and which are infallible preservatives against bugs; I thought of importing them to England, but I remembered they could not be expected to guard any but Islamist bodies.

After that night we slept on the deck; and much pleasanter it was, with the glorious stars for our roof, than in the stuffy cabin and cupboard, which was all our kandjeh afforded us. And indeed it was well worth while to sleep à la belle étoile, to have full opportunity of seeing the beautiful Southern Cross, denied to European eyes. We used to lie awake between two and four o'clock each morning, for the pleasure of looking at the lovely constellation, — such a mysterious emblem of Nature's holiness it always seemed — as if the heavens came closer, plus rapprochés to one's heart, in wearing the simple but well-known symbol of our Faith; and that these lovely stars visibly glorified the material image of the only path on earth that leads to a sure home amongst those starry hosts of heaven. It is a strange sensation, but an absolute fact, that the stars in Nubia seem really and tangibly nearer to you than in Europe: not that the sky seems nearer, for, on the contrary, it is lifted up to an infinitude far above what we ever see in our cieux couverts of northern latitudes, — but that the stars themselves seem to hang lower down, to lean out of heaven towards man, shining on him with the marvellous glowing radiance that seems to bring home to the heart a living testimony of the inconceivably glorious heaven above them.

Thus much of the sky over Nubia; of the land itself the produce is almost entirely confined to two vegetables, the palm and the castor-oil; it is one long, almost unbroken palm grove from end to end: the palm trees are all numbered, registered, and taxed; their fruit is the chief, almost the only food of the Nubians; they have nothing besides this but the beans whose flowers perfume the air at this season. The dates are sent down largely into Egypt, for no one eats an Egyptian date in Cairo or Alexandria if he can get a Nubian date; and the trade is increased by the dates brought in the caravans from Sennaar, which are much prized in the more northern latitudes. The second product of Nubia is the castor-oil, of which an immense quantity is consumed, externally, by the Nubian; the woolly hair of both sexes is soaked and matted into a stiff paste with the oil, and their bodies are rubbed over with it till they become polished and shiny. The oil keeps the skin from blistering or burning in the hot sun, which is the more necessary from their wearing no clothes; it likewise protects them from the attacks of mosquitos and other insects. The plant is extremely pretty; you have fruit and flower on the same branch, like the cotton tree which bears the pretty yellow blossom along with the silky, white, cotton tufts of the dry open pod, both at once; the castor-oil is red-stalked and of large, deeply cut leaves—the young ones, dark crimson-brown and purple, the old ones a bright green; the berries, like small chestnuts, of two shades of green, and the flowers white. I have heard of red and white flowers on the same tree, but we never saw them. The ugly, stunted-looking dôm palm every one knows by pictures, with its strange fan-shaped leaves, like bunches of green paper strongly electrified; and its fruit, large, dark red, deformed-looking apples.

On nearing Korosko the colouring of the scenery changes marvellously; the river winds so much as to appear frequently like a succession of lakes, enclosed by hills or mountains which have all become of a dark deep purple, sometimes quite black, while the sand which creeps up their sides, and over the plains beyond them, is no longer white, or even yellow, but a full rich apricot colour. About Korosko and Ibream, the mountains are singularly beautiful, and still more strange; their dark purple tints and the bright coloured sands contrasting finely with the luxuriant palm and the green beans, while the mountains themselves begin to assume the fantastic shapes which give to the whole land, more especially about Abou Simbil, such a weird and bewitched appearance. The idea irresistibly suggests itself, that the country has been lately burned, and each hill roasted; it seems as if nothing but a general conflagration could have given such a resemblance to over-baked pies, which the flame-coloured sand around them increases. One felt that there must be a legend of some such thing, and accordingly we were soon told how Surya, the Regent of the Sun, descended on the country one morning to say his prayers, when the waters dried up immediately, the mountains took fire, and the inhabitants were roasted to death. Ibream — a lovely subject for a sketch — is a lofty perpendicular bluff, with curious old caves cut in the face, and crowned with a castle, now in ruins, which must have been of great strength and size.

We reached Wady Halfeh only four days after leaving Mahatta, so that we had not exchanged boats for nothing; 220 miles in four days, one of which had been lost in tracking against a westerly wind, was not bad. It blew violently at Wady Halfeh, invariably the case there, it is said: the place looks wind-worn and desolate; not but that it was lively enough that evening, for a caravan from Dongola and Sennaar had just arrived, and the shore was covered with camels, and bales of elephants' teeth, bags of gum-arabic, and ostrich feathers; and we were pestered with people offering us the veriest rubbish for sale, as "Antika, antika!" even common bits of stone from the beach; one boy offered us an English halfpenny, and another some broken morsels of glass; but the best thing was a man, a few days after, picking up a button before the eyes of a gentleman from whose coat it had dropped off, and holding it up to him, crying out, "Antika! baksheesh, ya Howadji!"

There were no donkeys or any kind of rideable beast to be had at the village, so we mounted very early the following morning on rough baggage camels belonging to the caravan, in order to reach the Hill of Abouseer: we had no saddles or riding arrangements beyond a carpet and a mat thrown loosely over the beast's back, and how we stuck on is still a marvel to me,—but we firmly declined, after a momentary trial, all invitations to trot. After becoming a little accustomed to the discomfort of the situation, I liked the springy long step and even swing of the camel, and one could not but feel it in harmony with the scene around one. A marvellous scene, indeed, it was; a desolate Desert of seemingly endless sand, both white and deep yellow, with rocks breaking through of pale green, red, yellow, white, and purple; sometimes pieces shone sparkling in the sun, of so pure and clear an amethyst colour, that one quite started to tread over the seeming precious stone. About halfway we came to a solitary Sheikh's tomb in ruins: no other sign of man or life met our view during the whole five hours of the ride, not a man, nor a camel, nor even a gazelle or a jerboa; all was utter silence and space under the bluest of cloudless skies, and the rays of a scorching sun.

In another hour we had climbed up the back of the famous Hill of Abouseer, whose face is a perpendicular cliff, three hundred feet high, rising directly from the northern end of the second Cataract, or Batn el Hagjr*, as the Arabs call it. Many a fair land, and many a mountain panorama have I seen, but never has any view made more impression on me than that wondrous, though scarcely beautiful scene; the rock stands almost isolated, yet with hills and heights on the west side, and an immense plain to the south and east: and standing alone on its summit I thought of that "exceeding high mountain" whence "all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory thereof" were surveyed. But how different a view was this! kingdoms, indeed, there had been in the land laid out before me, with hundreds of temples, and palaces, and pyramids,—but of the glory of these there is now nought but ruin and desolation; "their memorial" even, has almost "perished with them," and the scene is one of the wildness of Nature only. Far, far away to the south and south-west rose the mountains of Dōngola and Kordofān, grey and blue in the distance: between us and them the great river wound through thousands and thousands of low black rocks, shining black like coals, extending nearly twenty miles, a mazy archipelago, but all jumbled into a mass that could scarcely be distinguished into islets—the black tinted here and there with shrubs of tamarisk; and as the river came within a few miles of our hill, it dashed and foamed into wider channels of white frothy waters, which joined into a smooth swift river, and, passing the base of Abouseer, flowed on past Wady Halfeh on its northern course. On each side of these miles of black Cataract spread the flat yellow desert, carrying on the eye westwards to the mountains of Dongola, and eastwards to the far away Arabian range, clothed in the loveliest hues of exquisite pale rosy lilac, half hidden in a dreamy kind of mist.

* Belly of stone.

We gazed and gazed, feeling as if we could never have enough; like prisoners from the window of their gaol, looking with longing eyes over the far "sweet south" we so ardently desired to explore, and over probably the most tropical scene in all the world that our eyes will ever behold. Turning back is often sad, but it never seemed so triste, or such starving work before, as when we set our faces northward to regain the boat — almost like a hungry beggar passing a baker's shop and turning away his head from the food he longs for and cannot have. But before we retraced our steps there was something to do, — to accomplish which I had armed myself with a hammer and chisel, not knowing in the least how to use them, but resolved to leave our names among the pilgrims who had rested on that narrow ledge of rock before us. A mighty company of names are gathered there, and a feeling of something awful came over one in the sight of the hundreds recorded on that unchanging stone — abiding there still like tangible shadows of those who carved them when in health and vigour, yet of whom so many are now already passed away! For only a few years — twenty at most — has that ancient river been open to travellers, yet already, like the Volume of the Great Book, that rock, the imperishable record of those who spent but one short hour of their brief existence there, is crowded with the names of the dead! Of those we personally knew, by far the greater number were gone into that land whence none return; and it was with a feeling of sad pleasure that we placed our names among them — thus making a sort of re-union in matter as well as in thought — a silent, half-living companionship. The sun was scorchingly hot, and, never having been a schoolboy, I found the stone-carving a very hard task, and was heartily glad when I had accomplished it: then we went slowly back to the kandjeh, with our heads wrapped in thick Scotch plaids to guard us from the midday rays to which we were not accustomed on shore.

The real wealth of the glorious old Nile is derived from its lowest affluent called the Black Nile — a river that rises in Abyssinia, near the town of Gondar, and pours into the great Nile just above Berber: the inundation owes its value to the greasy black mud suspended in the waters of this branch; and it is doubted by some persons whether the annual inundation would even take place were the Nile robbed of the mass of water that comes down the Black Nile; there might be a very large rise annually, but the water would subside without leaving that peculiar sediment which makes the soil of Egypt so fruitful. It was from knowing this that propositions were occasionally made by the enemies of Egypt in olden times of cutting off this branch, by turning its waters, before they left Abyssinia, into the Red Sea, and thereby reducing Egypt to a desert, or at least a very poor land; and on this account the Abyssinians were reported, in an ancient tradition, to have the power of reducing Egypt to utter and irreparable ruin.

This thick, greasy-feeling mud is thought to act beneficially upon other substances besides land: it is largely exported, dried in cakes, to all the hareems of Turkey; and the mud, re-softened in water, is laid on the skins of the fair ones of Damascus, Constantinople, and the beauties of Circassia and Georgia, to give whiteness and lustre to their complexions. Certainly the water of the Nile has the most charming influence on the skin, especially during its thickest flow. When we ascended the Nile, the water was of a deep rich brown, which had cleared, before we returned, to Cairo into a clear grey. It is the most delicious water in the world for drinking, even when very thick; you have but to let it stand an hour or so in a clay goolleh, and the most refreshing sweet water runs off, as agreeable to the taste as it is beneficial to the health.

The following evening we anchored close to Abou Simbil, in the prettiest reach of the river, where it was enclosed like a lake, between ranges of purple hills, and dressed in sunset hues of lilac and gold: these hills are most curious from their fantastic shapes, besides hundreds of others which rise suddenly from the flat, flame-coloured sand, like huge round haycocks with steeply sloping sides. We toiled up the steep bank of sand very early the next morning, as it is only the newly risen sun which can penetrate at all into the depths of that world-famous Temple of Abou Simbil, or Ibsamboul, as it is sometimes called.

Everybody is familiar with the interesting account of its resurrection from under the sand by the spade of Belzoni — that lesson of noble perseverance grandly rewarded; and since that time the Temple has been too often and too well described by able pens for me to use my feeble one in portraying its wonders: nor, indeed, can I hope here or elsewhere to do more than to render in some degree the impression made upon our own minds, rather than to give the actual description of the magnificent ruins of Egypt in themselves.

Our entrance into the Rock-temple is in nowise likely to be forgotten: the sand has now closed up the doorway (which was quite open a few years ago*) within eleven or twelve inches from the top, so that it would be impossible to enter it if the sand was flat, instead of being, as it is, on a steep slope. We divested ourselves of hats, &c. for the heat inside is intense, and we were puzzling over what was to happen next, when Achmet suddenly disappeared, shouting back directions to us from the depths inside the hole, in obedience to which we laid ourselves, one by one, flat on our faces, inserting our heels into the aperture, where being instantly seized on, petticoats and all, a few vigorous pulls drew us each safely through! such a ludicrously unpleasant operation that I could not help opening my mouth to laugh, thereby receiving half a pound of sand down my throat: still more intensely ludicrous did it seem, when half an hour afterwards we, being still inside, saw a gentleman undergo the same process—the feet first filling up the hole, and then the body coming thundering down the steep sand-slope into the darkness and silence within; it is needless to remark, that “jupons d’acier” are not in fashion at Abou Simbil.

After this very unusual exercise we required a little rest, and Achmet left us for half an hour that our eyes might become accustomed to the darkness within: and we were thankful enough to be alone, for very soon the light which pours through the little opening enabled us to distinguish the features of that far-famed hall, which sinks deeper and deeper into the heart the longer you behold it. Four colossal figures stand at each side of the middle aisle, as pillars dividing off the narrow and dark recesses behind them; all the light there is falls on these eight figures of Rameses now become Osiris, imbued with his almost superhuman strength and majesty, and divine calmness—the swathed legs and the unearthly repose of the face bespeaking the God of Death, as the crook and the knotted scourge portray the God of Judgment. There is little in accordance with our modern ideas of beauty in his features, yet the mind is more impressed with admiration—an admiration that almost oppresses the heart—at the majestic, passionless purity and perfect peace of that countenance, than at the most exquisite Grecian model of all that is most beautiful in man; something more is here, more than mere symbolism, and far beyond mere human beauty, however perfect; something that speaks to the mind with an eight-fold voice, as clearly as the grave, sweet mouth and the powerful arms crossed calmly on the breast, clasping the divine emblems, speak to the eye of the gazer—something which tells of the rest obtained, not by inaction but by conquest,—something that whispers almost irresistibly to the mind, “When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?” a quietness—a repose that is, indeed, almost unearthly, for it comes from far away,—he is dead, but speaking from beyond the earthly life he has quitted: it is not only that he has passed through death, but that Death is no more to him; he is now living—living again, but in silence—not in action, but in the life of thought, which is eternal,—he is gone, not into Death, but through Death into the Silent Land—the land of the great departed; and from that land, through the still silence between us and him, through the deep darkness of intervening ages of idolatry and ignorance, there seemed to come softly to our living ears the spiritual echoes of those voices, for long ages silent upon earth, yet whose praises are still ringing through eternity in adoration of the one same God Almighty—the same then as now to the pure in heart—even to them and to us as children of the same eternal and ever-present Father ;—through the long past ages these have stood there, and for long ages to come they will still stand there, silently singing their solemn, sweet chant, ever and ever the same, from those crossed arms and those serene, passion-stilled countenances, and those restful lips—“Children and brothers, your burden is heavy, your cares many ; but be of good courage—strive, struggle, fight your way on—conquer through all, and attain this calm, this peace, this rest, forgetting all the trials, sorrows, struggles of life in eternity.”

* The temple was cleared out, by order of the Pasha, for the visit of Lord Haddo; but since then the villagers have thrown the sand in again out of pure mischief.

“Daughter,” they softly said, “peace to thine heart !
We too, yes, daughter, have been as thou art :
Hope-lifted, doubt-depressed, seeing in part,
Tried, troubled, tempted, sustained as thou art.
Our God is thy God ; what He willeth is best ;
Trust Him as we trusted : — then — rest as we rest ! ”

Besides this hall there are fourteen chambers in the Temple, all perfectly dark, of course, though before the sand had choked up the entrance the four small figures which sit, as on an altar, at the furthest end of the adytum, facing the door, must have been dimly illumined by the rays of the rising sun (the Temple faces the east) ; and they must themselves have appeared to look, with their stony eyes, along the whole length of the Temple, and across the sacred ever-flowing Nile, to the deep purple unchanging mountains beyond his green banks. If the sacred hawk, the emblem of the Sun to whom the Temple is dedicated, was kept at the feet of these four statues, as some suppose, it must have been worse than the “penalties of royalty” to him, to be worshipped in the dark enclosure, instead of enjoying blessed liberty on the hills he could just descry without.

On the walls of the outer hall are represented the historic deeds and conquests of the great Rameses; the other chambers are also sculptured all over, and two or three of them have a stone divan extending along the sides: but the pictures are so blackened with smoke as to be very difficult to decipher, and the heat and suffocation in the inner rooms are so intense that it became impossible to examine half of them; strong lungs and head are absolutely necessary for a real examination of Abou Simbil in its present state; it was with much vexation that we turned to hurry out, but one was forced to retain strength enough in one's faint and semi-suffocated condition for the exit — head foremost — through the same little hole: an operation still more disagreeable than the entrance.

We lay down in the shadow of the rock to rest and breathe, and to feast our eyes quietly and thoroughly on the four colossal figures of the façade: three only are quite uncovered by the sand, and one of these has been destroyed to the waist, while of the fourth only the face is visible. These enormous figures — they are sixty-six feet in height without the pedestals — are of the great Rameses II., seated on his throne; his posture, the hands on the knees, signifying his rest after his many conquests, — viz. those portrayed within the Temple; these figures are as striking as the Osirides in the interior, but even more beautiful in face. The countenance is as grand, and perhaps more human, with an expression of majestic sweetness in the mouth and of triumph in the nose, which gives a sort of conviction to the mind that they are portraits. Till I saw those figures, I never could believe that features of such gigantic size could express such grace and benevolence, so sweetly and grandly mingled; but here, in reality, one felt in one's heart that Rameses — the glory of ancient Egypt's many glories, and the terror of the then known world — must have reigned over a people who loved him, as well as over slaves who feared him.

Then we turned to the mountains, now deep in violet shades against the eastern sky, which we had seen from the inside of the Temple, feeling that these, at least, had been beyond the power of man to change; and yet, strange to say, they seemed to have come within reach of a hand's grasp, as it were, across the almost immeasurable gulf between us and the thousands of centuries when these figures were fashioned by men's hands; strange to feel how Nature came close home to one's heart as man seemed fading away in such dim distance; how the

“sweet and potent voice” —

from “within the soul itself” * —

answered back the whisper from Nature's grandest works, and the inward life of man and of Nature met together in the same God-given thought; strange to recognise the links of that immortal chain which bound up the spiritual life of Nature, with the thoughts of those whose works of the Past were living still in the Present,—in those old Egyptians and in the children of the new west,—children of the same Father, with thoughts alike eternal in both.

We had hoped to have re-entered the temple in the afternoon, but we suffered so much from the effects of the vitiated air of the interior all the rest of the day, that we were compelled very reluctantly to give it up.

* Coleridge.

The small, but pretty Temple of Amada was the next at which we stopped; it is situated on the western bank, and commands a remarkably pretty landscape, and is in itself more picturesque than most of the ruins of Egypt: the sculptures are very lively and interesting, and in some places very fresh; but the little Temple is more than half buried in the sand. The next day a very high wind kept us moored to the bank—the only day on which we had imperfect weather in Nubia; but we found amusement in watching the brown children and girls who came down with butter and dates for sale: they were very shy, and screamed frightfully if ever we went near enough to pretend to touch them; but at any reasonably safe distance they would stand for an hour, even the tiniest of them, shouting “Baksheesh, baksheesh!” We went on in the night, but the wind continued to blow, and our old tub of a boat rolled so much, that—I grieve to say—we were both sea-sick!

Koofideena (or Maharrāka) occupied us the next morning; an unfinished Temple, looking still as if fresh from the hands of the builders, with its half-carved capitals, yet now in ruins: it is very pretty and worth seeing, though almost without sculptures, and not to be compared with the noble ruin of Dakkeh, which we explored in the afternoon. Here there is a fine view from the summit of the great pylon, I believe, but such a splendid mirage spread all around us during our stay that we never rightly distinguished between the truth and the pretty fable: the Temple itself is one of the most interesting. Then came Garf Hosseyn—a coarse travestie of Abou Simbil, nearly passing the “one step” from the sublime to the ridiculous: the clumsy giants, who are fast crumbling away here, bear little resemblance to the majestic figures in the other, reminding one only of the monsters of ancient India. In the beauty and dignity of Abou Simbil one almost forgets that from such conceptions man could degenerate into the darkness of idolatry—for there the spiritual life only is represented, which was afterwards clouded over by error and materialism; but in Garf Hosseyn the degradation of heathenism is brought before one: in the one, you feel instinctively that what is before you is the human representation of what is divine—imperfect, perhaps mistaken, as from the hands of men “seeing through a glass darkly,” yet with the aspirations of a heart “desiring a better country” expressed in it; whereas, in the other, the form is brutalisé into the expression of something utterly and only human, lower than human, and gigantically hideous; but what can one expect from a temple dedicated to the rude Vulcan? The whole place is swarming with bats, and is very disagreeable to examine; but the proportions of the Temple, which is hewn from the living rock, are very grand, and there has been a fine portico: it is nobly placed too, and the landscape from it is very green and lovely; as, indeed, were the views throughout this day’s voyage. We saw Dendour and Kalabshee—the latter a magnificent ruin, but being only of the date of Augustus it is too modern to claim as much attention as its size would otherwise command, and the hieroglyphics are miserable; it is, however, imposing, and curious too from its excessive ruin—it looks really as if it had been chopped up! and it is only by very active scrambling that one can see it at all.

But the gem of all the hieroglyphics of Nubia is to be found within a mile of Kalabshee, beautifully situated on a cliff commanding a long reach of the river and its bright green banks,—this is the rock-hewn grottotemple of Beit el Wely. It is very small, consisting of only an adytum and a hall, supported on two columns; the sides are filled with representations of the victories of Rameses II. over the Cushites (Ethiopians) and the Shori. In many places the paint is fresh as ever, the pupils of the eyes of Rameses still preserving their sharply defined blackness, and the pattern of red and blue embroidery on his robes still bright and clear; the piece washed by Miss Martineau is cleaner than most of the rest, and is of course pointed out by every dragoman. Outside the Temple the two sides of the area or court are covered with small, but most lifeful figures:—on the one side Rameses is represented in the act of conquering the Ethiopians, with portraits of all the offerings presented to him by the newly-conquered people; on the other, the great king is seen besieging the fortified city of the Shori, who make a determined resistance; the conqueror is also represented engaging in single combat with a chief of the Shori, and afterwards sitting on his throne receiving a group of prisoners, conducted by his son: they are certainly most living and spirited, but they scarcely equal the highly-imagined description given of them by some travellers.

One night more of delicious fresh warm air — though at Kalabshee we had left the Tropic of Cancer—and on the evening of the next day, by the glorious starlight, we drifted swiftly and noiselessly down the narrow stream, between the dark high cliffs which charmed us still more in returning than when ascending the river, and anchored by the shore of beautiful Philæ. Our tent was already pitched on the sand, and we thankfully enjoyed such a night's sleep as we had not once had in our carnivorous kandjeh.

CHAP. IV.

CATARACT AND FLAME.

Who can describe Philæ? and what good would even pages and pages of writing do to the minds of our readers? nought, I fear, but confusion, since Philæ is made up of apparently incongruous elements, each beautiful in itself, though combining badly enough together in description, but which in reality melt into one harmonious whole; stern and wild, yet soft and lovely—grand in feature, yet exquisite in detail—calm and silent in its deep repose, yet surrounded with life and sound—the vast white of the desert, and the deep grey of the river—the glowing purple of the mountains and the vivid green of the palm trees—the lustrous black of the weird rocks in the water and the fiery orange and red of the infernal-looking rocks on the shore,—the blue and pink granite, and the red and purple porphyry,—the creamy yellow of the ancient ruins, so grand and beautiful, yet so arid and unpicturesque, and the dry cracked, and crumbling mud huts around and all over them:—these are the various opposing features which combine into the one unique and perfect Philæ; of all spots in Egypt and Nubia the one to which perhaps one looks back through the vistas of memory with the most love and tenderness.

Much of its magnificently planned Temple was still unfinished when all was left to silence and ruin ; what would it have been in its complete beauty ! what must it have been even in its incomplete magnificence, when the pagan priests of old sang their hymns of worship along its sacred shore ! Isis and Osiris, with their son Horus, the type of youthful beauty, was the Triad worshipped here (Egyptian worship was always in triads), and the interior of the great temple is filled with their "domestic annals ;" but the earthly history of Osiris did not end here, for the oath, which has dreamily thrilled through our minds, so ancient in history to us, was a modern error among the Egyptians, and "He who sleeps in Philæ," was really believed by them to have been buried temporarily in Abydos.

The Temple and the buildings connected with it must have once entirely covered the island, which was nearly surrounded by a quay of smooth stone-work ; only a portion of this remains, and the chief parts of the Temple are now connected only by piles of broken stones : nothing, however, can lessen the grandeur of the enormous pylons and pyramidal towers in the centre ; of all the rest the effect is sadly spoiled, to our minds, by the perverse irregularity and unsymmetrical arrangement of all Egyptian architecture, which is nowhere shown more broadly—I had almost said, rudely,—than at Philæ. There are two splendid colonnades of pillars, commencing from a wall of rock rising at the southern end of the island ; but only a few of the pillars can be seen in true perspective, as the line of each colonnade is almost unaccountably crooked, following with unnecessary closeness the shore of the island ; many of the columns too are unfinished, with uncarved capitals, the grace and elegance of the first score making one doubly regret the vacancy of the others. After this and a whole heap of ruin, among which lie the broken limbs of a gigantic lion, you enter between enormous towers through one court into another : every side of the second square is different from the rest : one of them is occupied by a corridor of richly ornamented pillars, while on the opposite side is the small but beautiful temple dedicated to Horus. Beyond this is the gem of Philæ, "the ten-columned court," as it is called, of the great Temple : these columns are still quite perfect, and are almost the only ones in Egypt where the colours are really as fresh and bright as they must have been two thousand years ago—unlike the descriptions of enthusiastic tourists : their capitals are of the most vivid blue and green, picked out with red, crimson, and orange ; the roof is bright blue, with golden stars ; and the winged orb, typifying the Sun, is here more elaborately portrayed than usual. Then comes the adytum and several other chambers, all in darkness—thick darkness, the abode of bats and dismal odours—yet whose walls still hold vivid pictures, in spite of dirt and decay, of the birth and education of Horus, who stands between Isis, horned and sun-crowned, and Osiris with the crown and mitre. There are inner chambers, staircases still unbroken, passages innumerable, and some smaller temples ; one among them on the western side was dedicated to the god of the Nile, and is full of pretty water plants, lotus and papyrus, neatly and well sculptured ; whereas the colossal sculptures on the pylons, &c. are very coarse and ill done, unlike the really ancient hieroglyphics, for this temple was built by Ptolemy Epiphanes and Ptolemy Physcon, and was begun about 200 B.C. Turning to the east side of the island there is one beautiful and very graceful building : a quadrangle of columns, rising from a wall of only a few feet high, support an architrave, and again a cornice raised some feet above that; there is no roof, and the pillars and walls are, with the exception of a single winged Sun, quite unsculptured; the intention of the building in its unfinished condition is somewhat incomprehensible, but it is singularly elegant and pretty, in spite of the efforts of vulgar and low-minded individuals to deface it by the hideous scribbling of their own paltry names on its walls.

On the west of Philæ, there is a small island, called Biggeh, one huge heap of black and purple rocks, thrown and piled upon each other in the most wild and fantastic confusion; to the top of this we climbed in the afternoon — not a very easy or pleasant task, but worth achieving, as without seeing Philæ from its summit it is hardly possible to understand the plan of the ruins, through the thick crust of overlying mud huts, built, it is said, by the ancient Christians; or to see how beautifully the great Temple was placed in the centre of the river, which is here like a large oval lake, closed at the southern end by the lovely mountains, clad in soft Nubian colours: the river comes gliding from their bosoms to your feet, and, flowing by in a rapid deep current, hastens over the wild, black rocks, past all the bewitched-looking piled-up islands, into the north-west corner of the picture, from whence the distant roar of the Cataracts, borne upon the breeze, murmurs up occasionally into your ear. Behind you it is all black, burnt-up rock, like the outpourings from a furnace — mountains of slag, with patches of flame-coloured Nubian sand: at your feet lies Philæ, slumbering in calm beauty, and beyond that, the broad white pathway through the Desert to Assouān.

We were soon surrounded by the black islanders, and a number of little children, entirely naked, except a girdle of leathern fringe round the loins; one lovely little girl, with properly oiled and plaited hair, made great friends with us, insisting upon giving the support of her six-year-old arm to help even the gentlemen of our party to descend the rocks, or pointing out the way with her round, slender arms; nor would she quit us for a moment till we rowed away, leaving her graceful little figure poised on a pinnacle of rock, waving farewells with her little arms, and crying, "Ma salâmé! ma salâmé!" * nor did she once ask for baksheesh — a very remarkable circumstance in Egypt.

We devoted the next day to sketching in the beautiful ten-columned Court: a strange day for Philæ — for it rained unceasingly, small, fine rain, such as they said had not been seen there for twenty-two years, and the dark purple mountains and wild black rocks looked more eerie, and sad too, than ever, in the lowering un-Egyptian sky. A sandstorm came on in the evening, filling our tent to about eight inches' depth of sand in the course of an hour; and the sun rose on the morrow in a lurid heavy glare, soon shaded by rain, in which, however, we took leave of our dirty kandjeh, and sailed over to Mahatta in the boat of some friends who had kindly invited us into their dahabieh to see the shooting of the Cataract, as we were very anxious to enjoy that experience instead of riding again across the Desert to join our Wandering Maiden. We had no sooner reached Mahatta than a furious thunderstorm broke forth, the lightning playing round the rocks, and the thunder pealing away in thickening echoes, that seemed to gather up and give back the sound in hundred-fold majesty. The Arabs declared they would not pass the Cataract in such "weather of Satan," but after a couple of hours it passed off, and a cold sunshine having come out, we shipped about thirty Arabs, and the eight rowers took their places at the oars, tightening their turbans, and turning up their sleeves as though their work was to be done in earnest. We settled ourselves on the deck, admonished that the safety of the boat would be risked should we move hand or foot during the passage of the dangerous parts; and the Arabs squatted round, packing themselves tightly in the prow and on the upper deck, and carefully balancing the boat. Of course they all talked marvellously fast, but the voices lulled as we neared the Cataract: and, in something less than half an hour, silence fell on all save the rowers, who for once keeping good time with their oars, kept singing their "Hayalee-sah!" vigorously—the old Reïs of the cataract standing on the upper deck (a grand old white-bearded Nubian he was), shouting short, deep-toned words of command to the helmsman and to the Reïs of the dahabieh, who stood in the prow with a stout pole ready for action. Every face was turned to the narrow passage between the noble black rocks, down which we were to pass—every eye was fixed and eager—and here and there a hand was raised or the fingers tightened in a clasp, as if in mute appeal to the spirits of the rushing waters, to bear us down gently and safely. On we went, swiftly and smoothly gliding through the labyrinth of rocks which seemed to fly past, scarcely a yard's distance on either side of us,—swifter and swifter in the rushing, boiling mass, till the dahabieh seemed to bend for a brief second, poised in mid air over the edge—then, down she leaped with one swinging bound into the white whirling foam at the bottom, spun half round in the eddy, — sped away beyond the strength of the rowers in a sideways plunge—and the Cataract was passed! The Arabs all joined in a shout of triumph, and the Reïs of the Cataract had just time to snatch the turban from the head of the dragoman (his invariable perquisite from the owner of every boat which has safely passed the Cataract under his guidance), into whose white lips the blood had just time to return, when a reeling shudder shivered through the vessel from stem to stern—she gave a sort of stagger in the water—and bounded off from a pointed rock which had knocked a tolerably large hole in her bow! It was no great harm, however,—we passed another smaller descent a few minutes after in safety, and soon moored in a little cove for the double purpose of getting rid of our host of Arabs and to put the vessel in order—as all the chairs, divans, and spare spars, &c., had been built up en masse in the stern, to balance the boat more perfectly: it was then just one hour since we had left Mahatta.

* Good bye! good bye! More literally, "Go in peace!"

Three hours after we found ourselves comfortably reinstated in our pretty “Wandering Maiden,” which seemed a perfect palace after our miserable Nubian barge; and we spent the remainder of the day in walking over that much be-praised island of Elephantine, whose beauties, if it ever had any, are now hidden under heaps of broken pottery of marvellous depth, among which the ruins of one small gateway still remains, and a few palms. The view, however, from the southern end, of the Nile studded with black islets, with green and purple banks, is very pretty. It was more interesting to ride out once again into the desert, winding among the beautiful pink, white, and yellow rocks to the quarry, where the marks of man’s work still linger in a sort of ancient freshness, on the half-carved Obelisk, which lies unfinished and unremoved from the rock, whence so many thousands of blocks have been cut and conveyed down the Nile, to build up the unperishing memorials of "a people terrible from their beginning and hitherto, a nation extending its limits, a victorious people whose land is washed down by rivers!"

A heavy wind detained us within a few miles of Assouân for two days, the bumping of the boat against the waves making us unpleasantly sick. On the third day we made a long row in the little felucca to the beautiful ruin of Koom Ombos, one of the finest in Egypt. An enormous wall, raised on an artificial substruction, and pierced with a lofty gateway in the centre, towers above the river; a grand hall once stood here, it is said, but it is entirely ruined and fallen into heaps of broken stone. The Temple itself, built in honour of two divinities, the god of the Temple, hawk-headed, and that of Ombos, crocodile-headed, is half buried in the sand; and the two sanctuaries, an arrangement peculiar to Koom Ombos, have almost disappeared, but what remains of the fine lofty portico is remarkably beautiful: the capitals of the huge but not clumsy pillars are richly and most elegantly carved; the sculptures are well done and easily decipherable, and the painting on the roof is still bright and fresh. It is the more interesting from being in some places unfinished, the squares, drawn for the convenience of the copying artist, being yet clearly visible. As the portico is almost perfect, within and without, it is a good example of the smaller Egyptian temples; and the finish of the carving is the more easily examined from the overlying sand raising one half way up the pillars. Yet how well this beautiful temple would repay clearing, and how easily it might be done!

It was now midday, and the sun was very hot: we waited hopelessly long, as it seemed to us, for our boat, and scarcely knew where to look for her; for, far away, winding from beneath our feet, the Nile glided into a misty haze, which seemed only to end in sand,—then, coming back from the dim horizon eastwards, came a long reach of the river, bending round towards us, and back again to the south: the banks were shaded with rich palm trees, and we fancied we could distinguish sails upon the blue grey water. We sat looking and upbraiding ourselves for not having observed how much our course must have wound round in the early morning, when river and banks began to tremble, the sand seemed to rise in a faint hot haze, and on changing our point of view by a few yards in height the whole panorama dissolved away into “the devil’s water,” as the Arabs call the mirage of the Desert.

We spent the following morning—the 16th of February—in examining the very ancient rock-hewn grotto of Hajr Silsilis on the eastern side of the river, with its most interesting and life-like sculptures, and afterwards had a scrambling walk over some of the gigantic quarries on the same bank; we hoped to have reached Edfou by daylight, but the sun sank, and a glorious moon arose before we moored at the bank about six o’clock. A boat belonging to the Mr. Jacksons came up at the same time, and we agreed to visit the temple by moonlight in one party, in consequence of Sir G. Wilkinson’s warning to travellers that the natives of Edfou are apt to be troublesome, and sometimes to molest one impertinently. We determined to be extra-prudent, and desired our dragoman to select six of the sailors, provided with stout sticks, to accompany us, headed by Achmet himself and our man-servant; and, alas! we carefully took off our watches and rings, and the few trinkets and little valuables one cared for most, and put them by in our cabins, as we thought, in safety. Then we sallied forth en masse, — without hats, for it was a very sultry stifling night, — and had a pleasant walk over the fields for about three-quarters of an hour before we reached the magnificent Temple. It has gigantic pylons, and a huge square, with an interior peristyle of thirty-two columns; then comes a splendid portico of lofty and richly carved pillars, which looked mysteriously beautiful in the strong lights from the torches, and the deep black, conflicting shadows thrown by the bright moonbeams: then we mounted on the roof, in order to survey the wide extent of the Temple, and look down on the great courts, into which burning wood was thrown to show us, though dimly, their depth and width. The view thence too, in the calm clear moonlight, was serenely pretty; from the lofty platform on which we stood we looked over the village, which lay in a hollow below us, over a mile or so of field between us and the river bank, and then across the river, shining in silver lustre, to the dark, dim mountains on the other side. The bank was much too high to admit of our seeing the dahabiehs, but we remarked to each other that the sailors had lit a more than usually large fire on the bank, by the light of which our flags were gaily illuminated; but in another minute that seemingly trifling idea was forgotten. We lingered a little in the Temple, and then walked quickly through the village, stopping only to observe a circle of Derweeshes performing a zikk, or sacred dance; about twenty of them joined hand in hand, jerking their bodies forward with a short sudden start as fast as possible, violently nodding the head with every movement, first over one shoulder, then over the other, making with each jerk a loud harsh grunt, exactly like a London paviour, only that instead of being expressed with his slow stolidity, this sound was flung out with passionate excitement. Achmet, however, begged us not to loiter watching them, as the Edfou people are very fanatical, and might take umbrage at Frank inspection: so we went slowly on through the fields, enjoying the quiet silence of the hot night, and the bright moonbeams playing on the picturesque figures of the sailors accompanying us: alas, this pleasant half-hour was but the calm before the storm! we were within but a few yards of the bank, when the sailors in front made some loud exclamations and rushed up the steep slope—Achmet and all of us ran forward and looked down on what had been our beautiful boat—our little home—now a mass of flame! roaring and crackling with that terrible, long-to-be-remembered noise,—the devouring tongues of flame licking round the sides of the vessel—hissing in sudden quenchings upon the water—running in fine darting lines up the ropes—clinging round the masts—and, over all, the gay flag and the red and white streamer flying out in the fierce draught, redder and prettier than ever, in a sort of demoniac dance of triumph at its own illumination, till a higher and still higher tongue of flame leaped up and shrivelled it into black nothingness! It is easy to describe it even now—for I have but to close my eyes and the whole thing, living and horrible in its reality, comes only too vividly before me, burned into my memory. The dragoman of the other boat, the Tayr el Nil, and a few of our sailors, now that we were at hand to see them, were throwing up some small basinfuls of water upon the flames, which could be of no use at all,—the others stood passively looking on, only exclaiming, “Mash-allah, Mash-allah !” except ‘Ali, the sailors’ cook-boy, who was crying bitterly. Not a single thing had been thrown out from the inside of the boat, except the sailors’ own bread and their bundles of clothes ; nothing of ours had they attempted to save, but, on the contrary, had held back our maid by force when she tried, with the courage of an English-woman, to rush into the burning vessel and save my sister’s desk, which was in the outer cabin, containing money and some valuables. Within a quarter of an hour after our return the masts had disappeared, and the flames sunk down with sullen satiety into the hull, where alone there was anything left to consume ; and we stood upon that bank absolutely bereft of everything,—without home, food, clothes, or money, among a strange and savage people, three thousand miles away from home, and at some five hundred miles from the nearest spot where any of our wants could be supplied, with no means of getting there, apparently without friends or help ! Who could describe the forlornness of such a position, or the overwhelming feelings that rushed over our sinking hearts ? Such circumstances must be experienced to be understood ; and were I to try to tell of even a part of the present loneliness or the dim vista of future difficulties and dangers, it would but appear exaggerated to those who have not gone through something of the kind ; God alone knows what it was to us, even as His Arm alone could support us under the trial.

But in this hour of direst need, help and friends were — God be thanked — close at hand. The Mr. Jacksons, whose boat had arrived at the same time as our own at Edfou, insisted on our coming at once on board their dahabieh, and immediately, with the most generous kindness, devoted the whole of the inner cabins to the use of ourselves and our maid, and placed their stock of clothes, linen, stores, and all other necessities, at our disposal. With these, and other kind gifts received from several of the boats we afterwards encountered, and which were always pressed upon us with the most liberal kindness, we managed to get through the seven weeks that elapsed before we reached Cairo, not quite in rags, and in some degree of comfort,—although of course the want of constant change of clothes is a great privation in a hot country, and necessarily there were scores of things wanting which not even the kindest ingenuity could supply in a boat and outfit originally furnished only to supply the wants of two gentlemen; to say nothing of the distress of feeling to what discomfort our intrusion must have reduced our kind hosts, excluding them from the principal part of the boat, and changing all their own comfortable arrangements by the occupation of five persons in a dahabieh only adapted for two. But from Edfou to Cairo no one effort was ever spared by them to make us forget our own losses, or to assure us that their comfort and convenience was not only willingly but gladly sacrificed to ours, by those who were comparative strangers, with whom we had only been acquainted three or four weeks by meeting occasionally here and there on the Nile.

No fellow Christians, under the circumstances, could have refused to give us an asylum in their boat at the time, but the manner in which the hospitality was rendered made all the difference in the world to us; and, anomalous as our position could not help being, it was a good deal to be assured that we were not looked upon as intruders, but were really welcome. We had hoped to have found at Thebes a boat of some kind, in which we could have descended the river to Cairo, with some of our sailors and our own dragoman; but there was not even an Arab kandjeh to be had, and our friends foresaw that we might find ourselves very unpleasantly situated had the dragoman taken the opportunity of our separation from Europeans to demand promissory notes of payment for his boat; we thought our man-servant was sufficient protection against this, but they decided that it was better we should not risk it: failing this we felt sure there would be some large dahabieh at Thebes, with ladies on board, willing to make a spare cabin for us; but no such offer came; one young lady, Miss Musters, lent us all she could spare of the clothes we so much needed; and Mrs. Hood, who was still at Thebes, shared with us everything she possessed with the most unselfish kindness; but from the boats then at Luxor no other lady broke through the formalities of lacking an "introduction" to Englishwomen in distress; and we found our countrymen far more generous and thoughtful for us than our countrywomen; all their little stores of handkerchiefs, brushes and combs, needles and threads, &c. &c., were brought out and pressed upon us, and one gentleman even sent us shawls and green veils!

There was one very large dahabieh with a small party on board, which came down the river to Luxor while we were there:—they offered nothing of their own accord, but in our utter distress for some of the common necessities that gentlemen could not supply, we ventured to send our maid on board to ask for some common materials requisite for making up the clothes we had contrived out of Arab cotton; the reply to this our first essay in the art of begging was—the gift of one hook and eye! We sought for nothing more from that boat.

In contrast to this, another lady who was at Assouān when the news of our misfortune reached her, immediately prepared with her own hands every article of clothing she could possibly spare, packed them up together and kept them ready in hourly hopes of overtaking us, or of finding some quicker means of sending them to us! Unfortunately their dahabieh was detained by the same winds that detained us, and it was not till her arrival in Cairo, a week later than ours, that we knew of, or could profit by, her true hearty kindness.

It was not at first that we fully realised how great our loss had been; our penniless condition forced to accept the hospitality, however kindly bestowed, by our companions and friends, was painful enough; so was the heavy loss in money, clothes, &c. and the necessity of replacing the latter at prices three times their value in Cairo: but besides this, we had a really valuable stock of books on board, and—still more valuable to us because irreplaceable—all our journals, notes, and our little collections of antiquities bought at various places—all our drawings and sketches, and, alas! many a dearly loved little treasure of past days, which neither time nor money can ever replace. Not then, nor for very long afterwards, did we really know the length and depth of our losses—losses which we still feel sometimes sadly enough.

The cause of the fire was briefly this: our maid, who had been left in the boat, went out, as she usually did in the evenings, to walk for a few minutes on the bank: she had been ironing till dark in the stern cabin, and had hung up a quantity of clothes on lines across it;

on leaving it she omitted to lock the door behind her, and 'Ali, the sailors' cook-boy, seized the opportunity of going in, with a light in his hand, to steal money out of the man servant's coat, which was hanging up inside, or perhaps to pilfer the store-bags of nuts, raisins, &c. which were there also. We learned afterwards that he had stolen money twice before from the servants, but Achmet had always entreated that we might not be informed of this, saying that 'Ali (for whom, as well as for all the sailors, he was answerable) must be caught in the very act of stealing. He was strictly forbidden to enter the cabins at all, but unhappily the fatal opportunity was now afforded him, while the Reïs was at his prayers, and the few sailors left on board were performing their evening ablutions: the draught from the open window probably blew the hanging clothes into his candle, and seeing the flames all round him, he rushed out screaming, "What will become of me! I am undone, undone! I have set fire to the ship!" and in another minute the flames burst out of the windows. These words of 'Ali's were translated at the very moment by Mr. Jackson's dragoman to our maid as she stood on the bank: Achmet afterwards denied all this when he got to Cairo, and gave out several stories, each one differing from the other, to account for the disaster. 'Ali, who was a bad specimen of the lowest Egyptian people, with a cunning, dishonest countenance, was taken up three times for stealing before we left Cairo, and we knew ourselves that neither Achmet nor 'Ali were very particular as to truth.

Our dragoman and man-servant both sat up all night to watch by the burned boat, and to keep off the villagers; and with the first dawn another dahabieh (the "Titania") came up; two of the gentlemen in her joined our friends in superintending the digging through, and the careful sifting of the ashes from the inside of the boat; a party of Arab boys were organized for this dirty work, who laboured intelligently and industriously enough throughout the day, only stopping occasionally over the irresistible temptation of a roasted potatoe, or broiled fig as they turned them up; or a pot of marmalade, into which they plunged their dirty fingers to suck off the jam, with great glee, ashes and all. A few sovereigns and some melted metal were recovered, and the works of my watch (of which the case was found curiously enough at some distance from the works), melted into a shapeless mass; a small box of silver ornaments, tightly packed in cotton wool, which had preserved them in perfect freshness, were the only other things found—a melancholy mockery to us, in want of all necessaries, was their silvery brightness shining in the ashes, so prettily useless; complete and fierce had been the fire, and rapid too—for the dry sun-heated boat burned like paper; but a good deal might have been saved in the first few moments, had any one of sense been at hand; and the sailors would probably have worked well and usefully had they been properly directed.

We had not either heart or head enough to revisit the Temple of Edfou, nor indeed had we much leisure for anything but trying to repair our losses, as far as we could, by adapting the various contributions we had received to our use. Our boat, which looked like a long green coffin with its painted hull just showing above the water, all black and charred within, and the words “Wandering Maiden” still gaily painted on the outside, preceded us down the river, carrying our dragoman and sailors; the owner of the “Titania” had kindly given a passage to our man-servant, for there was not a spare inch in the "Tayr el Nil"; and we stopped at Esneh only long enough to make a report of our loss to the worthy Kashef, or governor of the district, and to obtain a quantity of miserable Arab calico, after a long, weary bargaining in the bazaar. At El Kab we also made a halt, and rode to the rock-tombs, but we were so much worn out and stupified that I can recall nothing about them, beyond the general impression that they were well worth seeing.

Early in the morning of Sunday the 20th we reached Luxsor, where we had the comfort of attending the Church service, read by two clergymen at Mustapha's home, to a congregation of nearly forty English persons. There were, I think, ten dahabieh's at Luxsor on that day; and it required some little courage to face that congregation, even in the wilds of Egypt, in our destitute condition; this was, indeed, fully attested by our soiled dresses, half-burnt shawls, and old shooting caps—a most useful contribution to our wardrobes, given to us by one of the gentlemen we had met, and which we had covered with muslin, to give them a somewhat more lady-like appearance! Alas, our nice large shady hats had been burned! and only those who have been in a country of hot sun can imagine how much we missed them afterwards; nor had I even a pair of boots or shoes,—I had gone out that evening, for it was very hot, in a pair of linen slippers, and I had nothing else but these to walk in over the sands, stones, and rocks of Egypt all the seven weeks that elapsed between our fire and our reaching Cairo.

CHAP. V.

ETERNAL THOUGHT IN IMPERISHABLE STONE.

"With God's elect in every age
 And every race — the Athenian sage,
 And all those ancients who perceived
 And lived the truth they had received,
 In old Osirian mystery,
 In Boudha, Balder—holding pure
 That Faith through man's self-will obscure,
 And selfless ones for Hell decreed
 By men, because they lacked a creed."

HON. RODEN NOEL.

A BIRD skimming through the smoky sky of London, perching on this steeple or on that, here and there peering into a window, or picking a few crumbs in one street or in another, would have an endless tale of wonder to relate to the mate he left at home in his country nest; but the town-bred sparrow would not have much respect for the accuracy with which he described even the external architecture of the immense city, — and of all that was "underneath the eaves," what would he know? Just as much as a traveller, lingering his longest possible on the green plain of Thebes, may fancy he knows of even the ruins of that ancient City whose stones and walls are laid in desolate heaps upon the ground, whose statues and obelisks are now shapeless masses, and whose history is looked upon, but not read, by eyes that are unwillingly blinded by ignorance. The devotion of a long life is but sufficient for the understanding of a very little of what has gone before, — while much labour, much thought, and much study is indispensable for the comprehension of even the broken materials that lie there still. For only this latter object, we had endeavoured to prepare ourselves with some months of careful study, — although neither expecting, nor even hoping to have attained much; but the unfortunate disaster, described in my last chapter, cleared everything but its own troubles out of our heads, and produced such a numbing effect upon our minds and memories, that when, four days after, we began to examine the ruins of Thebes, we found it difficult enough to command our thoughts, and next to impossible to exert our memories of previous readings: present discomforts and small anxieties and awkwardnesses are sad hindrances to thought and study. A graver loss, both in itself and because they would have more than replaced our faded memories, was the loss of all our books, and the notes we had made in preparation for seeing the realities themselves, as well as various other useful maps, plans, &c., only intelligible on the spot, and with which we had been amply provided. From the want of books it was hard, more than hard, to profit even by what we saw; we were too much dispirited to recommence journals, &c., and we had no strength to spare for sketches of any kind, even had we had any materials. The shadowy memory of a bird's-eye view, is, therefore, all I have to offer to my readers; such as it is, I must let it go, trusting only, as I do for every other page I have written, that it may succeed in building up some faint picture of the reality before the minds of those who stay at home, — and, what is much more important, that it may induce others to go and see for themselves.

Ancient Thebes stretched across the whole plain which we now see at each side of the river Nile; but the principal part of the city was on the east bank, and only the royal palaces and temples were placed on the western side, which was otherwise occupied by the Tombs of the dead. The city was never enclosed by walls, and the "hundred gates" sung of by Homer, are supposed to have alluded to the portals of a hundred Temples, if, indeed, it was anything beyond a figure of speech. Thebes is believed to have been a great city, even before the invasion of that hated race of Shepherds, who ruled the country for several hundred years; but about 1500 years before Christ, the Theban kings expelled the Shepherds, and their city then became the capital of all Egypt, both Upper and Lower, and continued to be so for a thousand years; this thousand years contains all that is most brilliant and glorious in the most ancient history of the world. The removal of the throne to Saïs in Lower Egypt caused the decline of Thebes, and the invasion of Cambyses, the Persian conqueror, in B. C. 525, threw her into ruins, the last magnificence of which were crumbled into their present condition by the siege of Ptolemy Lathyrus, in B. C. 116, when the Thebans had revolted from the yoke of the Romans. It is with the thousand years of the glory of Thebes that we have to do in the examination of the ruins that now lie upon the verdant plain; would we could rebuild in our minds even a dream of their former splendour!

The enormous quantity of mud—the source of all the riches of Egypt—brought down every year by the river, gradually raises its bed: the water consequently extends slowly but surely over the plain, and leaves behind it a certain amount of soil; so, like the sand gathering round the feet of the Desert Temples, the green herbs wave higher and higher round the ruins of Thebes : and thus, year by year, the two great Colossi seem to be sinking gradually down among the young grasses of the plain. These two, sitting, like the Sphinx, wrapped in the silent mystery of unnumbered years, are the first objects that attract one's view from the deck of one's dahabieh : scarcely changing in the varying light of morning and evening, they are always, and from every view the same — grand, calm, and almost sublime — their very ruin making them more mysteriously fine, in contrast to the perfect tranquillity of repose — not idleness, but the rest earned by long labour — expressed in their impressive figures ; one's first and last impressions of Thebes are hung upon those two broken but noble statues. Both represent Amunoph III.* (the predecessor by a thousand years of Rameses the Great), whose virtues and greatness are thus emphasised, as is always the case in Egypt, by reduplication and superhuman size. Behind them a stone causeway, of which the two Colossi were the outer sentinels, stretched back for eleven hundred feet, with pairs of statues and sphynxes at every few steps, up to the palace-temple of the same Amunoph ; scarcely anything now remains of it. The Colossus that was anciently so famous for the sweet sounds emitted at morning, was destroyed to the waist, it is said, by the barbarian Cambyses † : it has been rudely built up since with roughly hewn stones; the sounds are supposed to have been caused by a man, hidden in the huge lap of the statue, striking a hammer upon a stone which still lies there, and which rings like the sarcophagus of Suphis, and many other Egyptian stones. As the whole of this Libyan bank of the river was dedicated peculiarly to Athor, the Aphrodite of the Egyptians and the "president of the west," the Colossus, who surveyed the plain, could do no less than greet with a harmonious salutation the first rays of that sun, who was to sink at evening into the arms of his divine mistress. Standing, as it were, underneath his knees, are the figures of Amunoph's wife and mother, sculptured on the throne, as at Abou Simbil; the wife also reappears between his feet; while, on the throne the god Nilus is represented holding some of the plants that then grew in his bosom far away, but which he now annually leaves around the feet of the statue — like flowers laid upon a grave.

* Other opinions are, that the one covered with Greek inscriptions is that of Amunoph, but that the second represents his Prime-Minister, whose magnificent tomb is shown in the Valley of the Dead : it contains two very grand sitting figures of himself and his wife, besides some exquisite bas-reliefs of hieroglyphics. His name is said to have been Shammar ; the Arabs call the colossi Dammar and Shammar, and also Salamât — salutations — an evident allusion to the musical sounds so famous in tradition.

† Strabo says it was destroyed by an earthquake — the one seems as probable as the other.

The great palace-temple of Rameses II. is the first ruin visited on this western bank; it has been commonly called the Memnonium, from a confusion caused by the title of Mi-Ammoun belonging to Rameses the Great, but it is more rightly called the Rameseum; the expression palace-temple does not, at least in this instance, mean that the king and his court resided in the Temple, but only that rooms were attached to it where the king may have retired in the intervals of his own devotions, or after receiving the offerings of his people; and he may also have held his receptions in the grand courts or halls of assembly of the Temple; the Rameseum was called by Diodorus the "tomb of Osimandyas" (Rameses); but it is not quite this, the dead king's actual tomb * was in the mountain side, towards the setting sun, and this Temple is consecrated only to his memory; and here, therefore, as in a few other Temples, there is no sanctuary or adytum appropriated to the image of a particular god. The Pyramids had each of them a small Temple on their eastern side, consecrated to the dead who lay beneath them; and the Rameseum bears the same relation to the mountain Tomb of the king, as the memorial Temple bore to the Pyramid.

* No. 7.

The Rameseum is one of the finest and most complete of all these ruins; the noble pylons are still standing, with a good deal of the first and second courts, including the fine interior peristyle of the latter, which once contained eight Osiride pillars, and two splendid statues, the head of one of which is now in the British Museum; besides these there is nearly all the beautiful hypostyle hall, which, though small in comparison to that of Karnak, is very fine. The sculptures here are more than commonly interesting: they are boldly and well executed, chiefly of battle scenes, some of them even more densely crowded with figures than Tintoret's famous "Paradiso" at Venice, but every figure is left perfectly clear and distinct; they illustrate the different modes of warfare, the varieties of kingdoms and peoples overcome by the great conqueror, with the king returning thanks to the gods for their assistance, while his deeds are noted down by Thoth: he is here given by the gods the sword and the sceptre — the one for his enemies and the other for his people, while the goodness of the king's character, which has rendered him the favoured son of the gods, is indicated by the stream of "pure life" poured upon his head by them; and so vivid is the interest raised in one's mind by these graphically portrayed historic scenes, that one turns with double curiosity to the mysteriously shattered colossal statue of the hero of every incident graven there, which lies close by, unquestionably a real true portrait; it is about the same size as those of the pair sitting on the plain, but cut in a finer stone,—one cannot conceive how such a block was transported here, carved or uncarved, from Assouän—it is nearly as large and heavy as the famous stone still lying in the quarry at Baalbek: but this huge mass once wore the same noble and beautiful features as the giant faces at Abou-Simbil, and that of the fallen hero lying in the mud at Mitrahenny (Memphis).

Then comes the beautiful old temple at Gourneh, of the great warrior Sethi, or Osirei I., completed by his son Rameses II.,—perhaps the most venerable looking of all the Theban ruins; it has a sad and melancholy air about it, but the sculptures are very interesting. There are two pylons one beyond the other, from each of which an avenue of sphynxes led to the temple, where a corridor of very elegant columns bears the dedication of the Temple to Amoun-Ra, the king of the gods, by Rameses II., who appears afterwards introduced by his father Osirei to the gods, among whom his grandfather Rameses I. is standing, bearing the insignia of Osiris, as a dead king now with, or absorbed into Osiris. This Temple lies to the north of the plain. Far away at the southern extremity is the magnificent pile of buildings now called Medeenet Habou, the palace and temple of Rameses III., who reigned about a hundred years later than Rameses the Great. This is probably the largest ruin in Egypt. There is here a temple with all the usual pylons, courts, sanctuary, &c.; and then another mass of towers, pavilions, courts, halls, and pylons, in one immense heap of confused ruin. The sculptures here, retaining the most vivid freshness of colour, are perhaps, on the whole, the most varied and interesting to be met with. Many pages would be required to give even a faint idea of their subjects; one open court alone with an interior peristyle, 123 feet by 133, is completely surrounded with battle and other scenes depicted in the liveliest manner possible. Every column also is painted in beautiful patterns, and, although these columns are but three diameters in height, the tout ensemble is one of the grandest things in ancient art. At Medeenet Habou, everything connected with the king may be seen and studied together; his leisure hours and his amusements in his court at home, his state processions abroad, are closely detailed in the walls of this palace, while on those of the towers and huge areas are all his noble deeds, and his religious ceremonials and duties. Unfortunately, within the latter the Copts made their cathedral, and the houses of their village filled up the surrounding ruins: much therefore has been sadly spoiled and intentionally mutilated, though they happily preserved many of the sculptures in their original brightness by concealing them under a plaster of mud; one cannot help fancying what grand cathedrals these beautiful hypæthral courts must have made, however incongruous the mixture of the past and the present.

Here Rameses III. dedicates all these buildings to his great father the god Amoun-Ra, who calls him his "friend," and, in company with other gods, presents him with the scythe wherewith to conquer and cut off all his enemies. The warrior king is then seen fighting his battles, after which he returns in triumph leading, or rather dragging his enemies by their hair, to show them to the gods, to whom also he makes rich thank-offerings, gratefully receiving their praises: his conquests have been innumerable, and his god-given virtues are nearly as many; his new subjects assure him that he "reigns like a mighty sun in Egypt,"—that his "courage is like that of the griffin—our breath is thine, as well as our lives, which are for ever in thy power,"—while he declares that he has but obeyed the command of Amoun-Ra, and conquered by the might of his god-given strength. The coronation of the king is also seen, and, while he offers incense to the protecting gods, carrier pigeons announce his greatness in all the four quarters of the world. The king also gains a great victory at sea, assisting his fleet of finely drawn ships by manœuvres on shore: to this fresh conquest he declares himself inspired by the spirit of Amoun-Ra, who has thus "laid the whole world at his feet."

Not far from the ruins of the royal palaces of Meedeenet Habou, the remains of an artificially made lake are distinctly discerned like that at Memphis: across this lake the corpses of the king and of all the nobles of the city were ferried with grand processions of boats, before they were drawn on sledges along the dreary valley, opening in the mountain range at whose feet we stand, to their "eternal habitations." We will delay speaking of them till we have glanced over the rest of the city of Thebes.

Luxor, being now a market town of some small dignity, has clustered its miserable houses within and without the once beautiful ruins of its Temple, and it is almost impossible to see them with any very intelligible understanding of their plan: one can only perceive that it is a fine and picturesque ruin. One beautiful obelisk (sister to that in Paris), still marks the site of the once proud city,—it is the oldest and most interesting of all the obelisks in Egypt, for it bears the name of Sesortasen the Great, of the twelfth dynasty, — (the king in whose reign the wonderful tombs of Beni-Hassan were hewn and painted) — and perhaps it stood there before Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter — perhaps even before Joseph was brought into the land of Egypt by the Bedouin ! yet the characters engraved upon its sides are as clear now as they were five or six thousand years ago, and one may well be excused for the fancy that the stone is as imperishable as the idea conveyed on it. These two obelisks commenced an avenue of twelve hundred giant ram-headed Sphynxes, which led from Luxsor to the pylon of the first temple of Karnak, each standing on a pedestal ; hundreds of these have been destroyed, but many, headless and broken, still border the empty path down which the long and gorgeous procession of priests, clad in panther skins, passed daily, carrying the ram-prowed barge containing the shrine of the god in whose honour the festival of the day was held, before whom burning incense was borne ; several of these Sphynxes are at Turin — very many at St. Petersburg — some in Berlin, and one or two in England. Another avenue of Sphynxes led from the front of this Temple to the bank of the river, overlooking Gourneh, and a third led in a southerly direction towards Luxsor.

The first Temple reached at Karnak is a very complete and fine one, approached by another Sphynx avenue — but one cannot linger here in one's impatience to see the Grand Temple itself, a few minutes further on. Two giant pylons open into a large court, with columns on two sides, and an aisle of columns up the centre, leading into the famous hypostyle hall, which Fergusson calls " the greatest of man's architectural works ; " the centre aisle is formed of twelve columns, sixty-two feet high, the largest if not the tallest columns in the world, with sixty-one smaller columns on each side of them; a beautiful clerestory runs along the top of each first row of the lower columns, and may have supported a stone roof over the middle aisle, as in the Rameseum: the rest was probably hypæthral,—some suppose it to have been covered in with hangings either of stuffs or of palm-leaf matting, but as ample shade must have been found beneath the very closely placed columns, even had it been hypæthral, one cannot help hoping that the blue sky was open to the worshippers within,—so beautiful is the effect of the sunlight and the shade of the columns falling athwart the apparently innumerable pillars. This is the place to see what a complete tapestry the hieroglyphics formed — here not an inch of wall or column is left uncovered with closely sculptured figures, once of brilliant colours — as complete a covering for the stone as the marble inlay of a Damascene house, or the brocade pattern of a modern house paper, — strange to say, every column has the same set repeated in rings all round it! but though so subordinate a feature, their sameness probably adds to the feeling of infinite space, as the eye is not attracted by any change of object, and therefore wanders on indefinitely among the mighty forest of 6420 square yards. Behind this and the slender rose-granite obelisks, happily still erect, is the fine hall and adytum of this Temple: then comes, within the same outer enclosure, the palace of Thothmes III., where the hall is supported by alternate rows of square and round pillars with reversed capitals; in one of the many chambers behind it the valuable list of the sixty predecessors of Thothmes was found sculptured, which is now in Paris. Deeply interesting indeed are the splendid sculptures that cover the great walls throughout this pile of buildings, portraying the history of a thousand conquests, — among them that of the land of Palestine, with its name of Canaan and Yooda Melchi — the Judah kingdom, conquered by Shishak or Sheshonk in 971 B. C.

Numbers of other ruins of great interest lie scattered around this great Temple, in strange but picturesque variety, among palm groves and verdant fields; and it is pleasant to wander from one to the other, and rest one's mind, oppressed with the stupendous ideas generated by these ruins, so sublimely expressed in the stone and pictured in the sculptures, while listening to the evening breeze among the palms, and the melancholy chaunt of the fellāh, and watching the flocks of exquisite tiny paroquets with shining green feathers and crimson bills, flitting about in the sweet air. And it is right to linger — for this is truly one of the grandest scenes that earth can show; Athens, with all the delicate refinements of comparatively modern days, stands smiling like a white dove pluming herself on the summit of her noble rock, a pæan of war still echoing round her white statues, — Palmyra, far away in the silence and solitude of Nature's wildest and most impressive splendour, sings sweetly to herself the sad elegy of her own dead glory, — but Karnak, with no natural beauty save the ever cloudless sky and the delicious air over the fresh green palm groves and the yellow sand, closes down upon the mind with a grand and almost awful solemnity; and the feeling comes over one, that while in the others the chivalry and poetry of life were solidified in stone, you have here the expression of man's deepest religion. I have often thought since, that Athens told of the bright and hopeful ardour of the busy morning, — Palmyra, of the lovely tenderness of beauteous evening, — and Karnak, of the calm and holy night, in closer communion with all beyond this world.

Let us now go slowly down over the fields, through the groups of trees to the river bank, and, crossing the wide grey stream, land on the western side, threading the green paths between the rich fields of waving dhourra, till we reach the low mountain range at the back of the plain: here, turning a little to the right, we enter a narrow defile, which the Arabs call the Biban el Molook, or Valley of the Kings; it ought rather to be called the Valley of the Shadow of Death, for the reality of Death is further on. The winding ravine is an absolute Desert of loose stones, with steep rocky sides, broken, jagged and crumbling, of bright yellow and orange cliffs, with here and there a blackened, burnt-up summit: it is not high enough to be very grand, but it is utterly and intensely desolate and dreary,—nothing can be more solitary and silent—not a bird nor a moving insect is to be seen—not a sound of any kind heard; it is generally painfully hot and glaring, and forms a fit passage to the Land of Death beyond.

After a ride of about an hour, the valley opens to a somewhat greater width; here, every rock and hill-side is honeycombed with excavations, receding back to the extent of from two to four hundred feet—chamber succeeds to chamber, passage to passage: nearly all slope downwards as they recede; some have staircases cut down to much lower levels, as if to sink the body of the deceased lower and lower under the crust of the mountain,—but the reason was probably to avoid faults in the rock. The larger chambers are supported on pillars left in the excavation, but smoothed over for the reception of hieroglyphics; some have divans round a few of the chambers: the sarcophagus rarely remains; in some it was buried in a pit, and carefully covered over.

The Tombs in this valley appear to have been entirely devoted to kings and royal personages, whose bodies were probably concealed in secret passages lest avarice should lead to the plunder of the tomb, and the sacred person of the king be discovered: the Egyptians seem to have considered that the body might at some time be reclaimed, and, at any rate, they regarded what had once contained the divine spark of any man as sacred; it was therefore carefully embalmed and laid by with some of his regal ornaments, a list of his possessions, and a roll of prayers written on papyrus. This set of tombs are all of the Theban kings of the XIXth and XXth dynasties: sometimes a king of later days has taken the place of one of his predecessors, when his name is seen to be marked in a different style to the rest of the sculptures. Near Medeenet-Habou is a small valley containing the Tombs of the queens; while beyond those of the kings are the Tombs of priests and rich men, in a place called the Valley of Assaseef. It is believed that among these Tombs some were excavated and ornamented with sculptures appropriate to the solemn place — with the lessons for the living drawn from the life of the Dead, and the hopes and fears of the future: blanks were left for the names and peculiar titles or biography of the individual who afterwards bought the Tomb, which were filled up at the time of his death, — some remain still unfilled, and some tombs are supposed never to have been occupied, save by the bodies of the modern dead, thrust in in after times. The roofs of these Tombs are generally lined with crude brick, and covered with stucco, as are the walls on which the hieroglyphics are painted. Over the portal of each is painted the great red disk of the sun, signifying that the soul of the deceased is gone down into the darkness with him, and, after traversing the shades, will ultimately rise up with him again. Near the entrance you find the scarabæus (the emblem of the resurrection), and the crocodile (the emblem of darkness); while beyond the sarcophagus you come to the young Horus, son of Osiris, the Divine Man, who again signifies the resurrection.

It is impossible to give an idea of the immense variety of the sculptures which tapestry the walls of these tombs, and, happily, it is unnecessary to do so, as so many excellent descriptions are already published of them: suffice it to say, that they illustrate every trade, profession, manufacture, occupation, and custom of the ancient Egyptians, besides the religious and royal ceremonies, and the minutest details of the burying of the kings and the nobles: the tombs of private individuals are still more generally interesting.*

The chief thought made present to one's mind in examining the Temples and Palaces of the Egyptian kings, is their (natural) pride in the extension and glory of their conquests: the next is the perception of how invariably every triumph and every blessing was acknowledged as bestowed by the supreme God, the Father and Giver of all good. At every moment throughout his life we find the king honouring, reverencing, and, perhaps, propitiating the gods to whom he daily pays his grateful homage, and to whom he offers up his prayers for virtue and life, as well as for the throne and power they have conferred upon him. In death he is portrayed in still closer communion with the gods; the short and varied term of earthly life appears over, and the spirit, parted from the body, commences a new and still more important life, the entrance to which is attended by the most rigorous difficulties, for the overcoming of which he has been preparing throughout his earthly career. And truly to us, this Life in Death seems almost more comprehensible than that which has come before: here there are but few signs of ruin and destruction—we know that all have equally passed away, but the Life after Death seems nearer to us than the Life before Death,—the idea of the grave and of judgment is closer akin to our minds than the old-world customs of the past,—Death seems a link binding us into one brotherhood, and is, in truth to us, more living than Life.

* The tombs best worth seeing among those of the kings are Nos. 17, 11, 6, 14, and 9; the magnificent tomb of the priest Petumunap, in the valley of Assaseef; that of King Amoun Toonh: Nos. 5, 16, 17, 31, 34, and 35 of those at Goorneh Murraee; and another among these latter, inhabited by a family of Arabs, and very difficult to crawl into, containing the most varied and lively representations of all kinds of hunting.

The awfulness of the future judgment began with the ancient Egyptians even upon earth*; a type of it was enacted over the dead body, carried across the lake for burial, by forty-two judges, who each examined the testimony given of the candidate's innocence or transgression in each of the forty-two sins most common to man; if the dead man was proved to have been of an immoral character, whether king, priest, or peasant, he was refused burial.† The mummy is everywhere entitled "the habitation of Osiris:" it is carried to the tomb in his boat—his symbols precede and follow it in procession, and the high priest offers incense to it. The soul was supposed to sleep during the forty days of

* Champollion. Martineau's Eastern Travel, p. 194.

† Osburn, Mon. Hist. vol. i. p. 427.

embalming; it then revived again and accompanied the body to the tomb, where it received liberation. In the "Book of the Dead" (the Turin copy), Isis and Nephtys are thus addressed:—"Oh ye liberators of the souls of them that are built into a house of Osiris," (that is, made into a mummy), "liberate the soul of M—— whom ye have made into a house of Osiris: he sees as ye see, he hears as ye hear, stands as ye stand, sits as ye sit." The soul is then directed to pay adoration to Ra, the rising sun, and Athom, the setting sun. In the illustrations that occur here in this papyrus, the soul* is seen entering the bark of the sun in the twelfth hour of the day: the disk of the sun is seen passing the portals of the west, which are opened by male and female guardians: then the orb of day is seen to have entered into the cave, where he is received into the arms of Athom, his human impersonation, while eight apes shriek forth the impurities of the soul that accompanies him; after this the soul is seen, arrived in the world of spirits underground, adoring the souls of his deceased ancestors, offering them incense and libations. Afterwards, the adventures of the soul in Hades are described: they consist of transmigrations into the forms of many divinities, all of them of the family of Osiris, who is styled "son of the sun," "the lord of the cave of Amenti," &c.; the disembodied spirit still navigating a river which represents the nocturnal path of the sun. It at length reached the ~~grand~~ hall of the judge of the dead, where his heart is tried in the balance

* The soul is portrayed under the symbol of a bird, usually the white ibis: it was natural to think "these beautiful white, silent, ghost-like birds, standing motionless and pensive on the sand-flats, might be the souls of the departed, waiting the completion of the funeral ceremonies."

—Osburn.

(upon which a cyno-cephalus, the emblem of Thoth, the scribe who has recorded his good and evil deeds, is sitting), by Anubis and Horus against the feathers (the emblem of truth and justice), and the sentence is pronounced by Thmee, the goddess of justice, in the presence of Osiris enthroned and holding the emblems of supreme judgment, the crozier and the scourge. The dead were instructed to make deprecations to the divinities presiding there, to the assessors who wear the feathers of truth and justice, and also to the forty-two avengers (represented in the tombs with various heads), who sat with knives ready to inflict torments on those that failed at the balance: thus he says, "I have neither done any sin nor omitted any duty to any man; I have committed no uncleanness; I have not prevaricated at the seat of justice," &c. &c.* If the soul was found really wanting, it is seen sent away in the form of a black or white dog, driven by the servants of Typhon down steeply sloping paths, descending in a Dantesque manner, deeper and deeper, according to his guilt. If the soul was found worthy of acceptance, the goddesses Hathor and Nutpe, deputed by Amoun-Ra, the Creator of the world, poured over him the water of eternal purity and life, and he was believed thenceforth to be reunited, if not absorbed, into the spirit of Osiris,—to have become a part of Osiris†; and in all future offerings made to the god, the soul is remembered as dwelling in Osiris, and, therefore, partaking of the gifts offered to him. At some future time, long after the judgment, three thousand years according to Greek tradition, the justified soul returned to the earth and resuscitated the body; but after many cycles, the final doom was probably rest with Osiris, the divine lord of spirits and of the spirit world, in whose person they arrived at the indescribable happiness of the presence of Amoun-Ra, the "hidden one," the lord of heaven, from whom he had emanated.

* Translated by Osburn.

† See page 58.

In the Egyptian religion every principle was embodied in some recognised type, under which form it was worshipped as partaking of the Divine nature: thus, the generation of life, the most important, and, to their naturally reverent minds, consequently the most sacred fact in creation—a fact in this world but not of it—a mystery utterly incomprehensible, and therefore to be the more venerated, — was worshipped in the persons of several gods and goddesses, such as Khem *, the god of generation par excellence, Kneph †, Maut, Pasht, Neith, Hathor, Isis, and many others—for each and every god and goddess had a share, as it were, in the Divine power; the vulture, the cat, the lion, the cow, and others, each and all were supposed to typify some Divine attribute, and were therefore considered sacred as types, not gods in themselves; probably they were to the Egyptians the less perfect manifestations of the things typified, partaking of the same one Divine nature, and thus truly Divine in themselves: yet it was only that peculiar attribute found in each which united them to Divinity, or had a Divine origin; just as the life which animated them must have been Divinely given. Thus the crocodile was sometimes worshipped as the type of strength ; but he was usually consecrated to Typhon as one of the types of evil things, such as darkness. It is somewhat hopeless to determine the reasons why the sacred animals were made respectively typical of certain principles, as they occasionally represented contrary ones : the ignorance of natural history at that time may sometimes account for the choice.

* In the 18th dynasty, Khem was erased in the hieroglyphic names, and Amoun-Ra (generator) substituted: Amoun-Ra was not worshipped earlier.

† Kneph is most frequently seen standing in the boat which Horus steers; he is the vivifying spirit of God, "brooding over the face of the waters." The serpent is stretched above him, and the ram is peculiarly sacred to him.

There were also deities of each nome or division of the land, and local deities in great variety : but we see signs of the united empire under the great dynasties, in these deities having each other's attributes, while, as Herodotus tells us, Osiris was universally worshipped. The principle of Triads seems to pervade every form of the worship, and is a subject well worthy of study ; it is difficult to ascertain the precise idea of the Father, Mother, and Child, but the Triad principle runs through all mythology, and, together with the worship of a God-Man, dying in his strife with Evil, and rising triumphant as the Judge of the Dead, is one of the remarkable evidences that God has been speaking to Man everywhere, and in every age : instead of being, as the school of Volney represent it, an argument against Christianity, such a coincidence is one of the strongest evidences of its truth.

The worship of the king is another instance of the worship of the Divine attribute ; he was deputed by the Gods in heaven to rule on earth for them ; he was divinely appointed and divinely assisted ; a portion of the Divine essence dwelt in the king, as king, and was so completely a part of the god from whom it came, and so separate from his human nature, that he could offer worship — not to himself, but — to the divinity in him ; although, of course, this Divine essence can only be materially pictured by the temporary habitation of his own human body, holding or wearing Divine symbols. For this reason the king bore the title of "the son of the sun"—a title which has been roughly rendered in our Bible as "Pharaoh,"—Ph being the article the—Ra, the sun. The king was High-Priest, and the princes were necessarily of the priestly order, while the queens were priestesses to the goddesses. Joseph and Moses, from their distinguished positions, must have been priests; and taking what St. Paul says of Moses, that "he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,"* with the fact that Joseph married Asenath, daughter of Pet-ph-Ra, priest of On†, we may infer that they were both initiated into the mysteries of Osiris, On being one of the principal places of the worship of Osiris.

The Egyptians found a spiritual meaning in everything natural, and inculcated this with the deep religious poetry of their grave, calm minds: thus Osiris, the Father Nile, and Isis, the Mother Earth of Egypt, were brother and sister as well as husband and wife; their life, they taught, is one of perfect, divinely-given happiness (because perfectly pure and holy), until Evil or Typhon—that is, all the noxious powers of Nature, sterility, darkness, and scorching heat—arrives and murders Osiris, who descends into the nether world, while the earth remains widowed under the dominion of Typhon,—that is, dry, burnt up, and sterile. Horus, the son of Osiris and Isis, the fruit grown upon the earth after the annual inundation of the river, grows up into manly strength, struggles with Evil, and, overcoming him, spreads fertility and blessing once more upon the soil; Horus is therefore entitled, "the great deliverer, the support of the world," and is invested with the signs of power and life; his face is as the hawk's, he wears the royal head-dress, and holds the anch, the sign of pure life, in his hand.

* Acts vii. 22.

† Gen. xli. 45.

To mention—for the assistance of travellers—a very few of the chief and most frequently repeated figures, we may speak of—AMOUN-RA the Creator, distinguished by the red disk of the sun, winged, and the feathers on his head: he is the great god of Thebes, the capital of Egypt, which was probably one of the reasons for his being the chief god of all; many others take his name as a prefix. As the name meant hidden, he would in his own character express one of the highest religious Ideas, and other divinities would be merged in him, so that, amidst the endless complexities of this idolatrous system, we have a glimpse at times of the Truth of the Divine Unity underlying all. The hawk, signifying omnivision, and the scarabæus, chiefly typical of creation and of the world, were sacred to Amoun-Ra; the complete ball of mud with which the latter surrounds its egg, and which it fashions and rolls away so ingeniously, might well suggest creation: and they seem to have had a fancy about all the beetles being males. It was also distinctly a type of the resurrection, and with this meaning its images were bound in a hundred ways upon every corpse, and painted upon every coffin as the pledge and token of a future life: still more strongly, and by a beautiful figure, the scarabæus is seen*, as it were, leaning out of heaven, and helping the mummy over the difficulties of the entrance, which, indeed, looks as if they expected the body to be included in the resurrection.

PASHT (corresponding to the Grecian goddess Diana) was the “mother of the gods,” and had the vulture sacred to her as the emblem of maternity, because she was supposed to feed her young with her own blood: this was changed in later times to the pelican. But Pasht in the Tombs is the goddess of fire, and presides over punishments: she is seen standing over souls enveloped in flames, with the sword of vengeance in her hand, and spitting fire upon them; she has a cat's head usually, but sometimes that of a lioness.

* In the Harper's or Bruce's tomb.

OSIRIS is known by the scourge of punishment for the wicked, and the crozier of acceptance for the righteous; the crozier is often seen held out by the kings to supplicants, just as Ahasuerus held it out to Esther.* He is called the "manifestor of good, the lord of life, the lord of spirits," &c.; his legs are swathed, to represent the repose of one who has passed through death.

ISIS (whose face is, like that of Osiris, always full of sweetness and dignity) has the sun's disk as the mother of the earth; and, in the character of Athor, the horns of the cow on her head, as the provider of nourishment (milk) for all the world. She is continually represented with the attributes of other goddesses; but as the great goddess, "the mother of the child" (Horus), she is distinguished by the throne as her head-dress, which is one of the hieroglyphs in the name of Osiris: in fact, her name is written similarly to his, but with the female sign, the egg; she has often the vulture as a head-dress, with the asp, and sometimes water-plants, as "the bride of the Nile." She corresponds, when in the Amenti, to Proserpine, but usually her character is that of Ceres.

NEITH (corresponding to Minerva) is goddess both of wisdom and of war: she wears the crown of Lower Egypt, and sometimes holds a bow and arrows, but more frequently a sceptre of flowers ; while her face is green, signifying the verdure of the fruitful earth. Her great Temple was at Saïs, and over the portal was this remarkable inscription : “ I am all that was, is, and shall be,—I proceed from myself,—none have lifted the veil that covers me.” The great mysteries of the burial of Osiris were performed on the lake at Saïs by torchlight, with those of Neith as Isis,—whence, says Herodotus, came the Greek Eleusinian mysteries, and the “ Thesmophoria.”

* Esther iv. 11.

NUTPE,—wife of Seb, and mother of the gods,—the heaven or firmament ; this is the Divine origin of Osiris, from the primæval Mother, the ineffable Darkness, and Time, his father. The figure of Nutpe within the sarcophagus, means that the soul is become as Osiris. In one Tomb *, she surrounds the whole ceiling of a chamber like a winding river, giving birth at one side to the Sun, the form of Day, who is led away by a group of gods along a path which grows shallower till it reaches a lake on the other side, through which he passes, and thence in solitude and darkness returns to the side whence he commenced his course.

SEB corresponds to Saturn as Chronos, Time ; an inscription reads : “ Saturn, youngest of all the gods, is my father,—I am Osiris ; ” so the Divine children of Seb constitute the third order of gods ; for there were three of these orders : 1. the eight Great Gods (according to Herodotus), Amoun, Kneph, &c. ; 2. Ra, and his family ; 3. the Osiride.

SET † represents Evil : he is brother of Osiris, and the son of Time ; he and Horus are sometimes seen pouring the anointing oil over the king,—Horus embraces him, and Set gives him weapons of war; the king also offers to, and propitiates the destroyer Set, that he may be induced to favour the king, and make him his instrument.

* No. 9.

† From this name comes the Arabic Sheitân, the devil or Satan.

One of the most interesting subjects of all in these Tombs, both for examination and thought, is that of the Serpent, which meets the eye at every step, and which evidently speaks a language of deep meaning, which one longs to hear and understand; it is one, however, about which, I believe, little is as yet known. These animals form the most conspicuous and important feature in every representation of a mystery, or of an unearthly ceremonial: frequently drawn as in nature, and as frequently with human heads, male or female; sometimes with many heads, with human legs, some turned one way, some another; occasionally with lion's paws; sometimes with a head at each end of the body, and some growing along the back, or ranges of mummies supported on it; sometimes — and these are always grand, giant serpents — they have vulture's wings, and bear a sun's disk. They are seen in battle with the gods, and in the end, overcome by them, they lie wounded and bound. Sometimes there are long rows of them, each one enwreathing a headless human body, forming grotesquely-shaped rings; they are painted of all colours, beautifully striped, mottled, or scaled; they are also seen lotus-crowned, with human legs, as the symbol of Kneph, the good spirit, the paternal and spirit-giving deity. In some Tombs the Serpent commences at the entrance, and winds in countless folds throughout the whole Tomb to the very end: sometimes he swallows his own tail in a circle, as the symbol of eternity. One can only say that they usually represent Evil, and perhaps more peculiarly Moral Evil than the god Set does. Coleridge takes the Serpent as symbolising the understanding; and in some cases this may be the meaning—"Now the Serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field."

But with the most accurate knowledge of the meaning of the hieroglyphics, the scholar still gropes in the dark respecting their less tangible translation; little more than has been already read historically from the walls of Temple and Tomb will probably ever be educed by the mere hieroglyphist; there is but one method by which we can ever hope to attain to their spiritual meaning; the old Greeks—rude, untutored infants in the days of Egypt's glory—drew from her the first sparks of that fire which they afterwards refined and beautified into models for all the world; from the days when the little band of Egyptians left the mouth of the Nile to plant a new kingdom on the fair shores of Greece, down to the thirteen years that Plato studied at Heliopolis, every Grecian superstructure will be found to have its foundation in the Egyptian faith: and only by the light of those who taught the deepest and highest philosophy of the Greek school, can the parent principles ever be solved.* The very gods bear all the same attributes and functions: Zeus is but Amoun-Ra, keeping, indeed, his Egyptian name; Seb turned into Chronos; Phthah into Hephæstos; Pasht into Artemis; Thoth into Hermes; while Athor, the lovely lady of the West, the Morning Star, became the queen of beauty, Venus-Aphrodite. True, the Greeks threw a poetic veil over them, and re-created them, as it were, with a new and fresh beauty, which made them peculiarly their own; yet not the less is every deep and holy idea of the Grecian mythology essentially and originally Egyptian.

* Doubtless the Greeks owed much also to the Phœnicians; but it is impossible to say how much the Phœnicians owed to the Egyptians.

There came a day in Egypt's shadeless land,
When, floating on the bosom of old Nile,
We stood between the walls of ancient Thebes
And noble Karnak's stately pile.

The "hundred gates" of Thebes are crumbled down,
And nought remains of all her splendid ways,
Save some few mounds with green and waving corn —
(The veil by Time laid o'er her glorious days) —

And endless ruins, in sublime decay,
Of Palace-Temples rich in sculptured strife,
And Tombs—where closed in everlasting rock,
Death now outliveth human life.

Across the swiftly flowing stream we passed
To gaze on Karnak's many-columned hall —
That vast hypæthral fane, whose beauty proud Never on thoughtful mind can pall.

Slowly the silent, ruined splendour sinks
Upon the heart, while gathering shades will throng
Of Past and Present time, confused in one Imaginative memory strong.

The living heart recalls in mortal guise
The ancient hearts that throbbed and fluttered there,
Their sorrow and their joy, bright hope and fear,
Their calm and strife, faith and despair.

While still those mighty columns proudly stand —
Outpassing human lives, yet lifeless things —
In grand disdain of those whose names they bear,
Long buried dust — once mighty Kings.

Three thousand years lie o'er each silent grave —
The shroud alike of evil and of good,—
And Death is but the link that binds us all
In one long chain of brotherhood.

And now we come from then unpeopled isles,
With hearts as apt to throb as those of old;
The same brief joys, bright hopes and dark despairs,
The same long strife for victory cold.

We strive to cast the Present day aside,
And live again with these bright pictured shades,—
The insolence of Life o'ercomes the Past —

We grasp them — as the vision fades.

But higher links unite eternal souls,
Remembering how th' Egyptian loved to pray,
Where God's own sky his grateful vision met,—

Sublime by night — more grand by day.

For we too kneel beneath that unchanged sky,
That same Jehovah from our hearts adore,
Our Judge and theirs of evil and of good — Saviour and Friend to us still more.

On storied walls their kingly strife we see God-ordered, and their victories God-given,
While all alike their deathless souls prepared
To gain th' unpictured joys of Heaven.

Oh ye who linger 'neath the welcome shade
Of this time-honoured and time-ruined fane, Unite your living souls with these of old
The eternal rest of peace to gain.

Kneel down and pray the Spirit of our God
Will seal your brow with token of His love,
Your little place in that vast Heaven to find Midst deathless multitudes above.

The Temple of Denderah should be seen in ascending the Nile, as it loses all interest of detail, after the Temples and Tombs of Thebes, the hieroglyphics broadly testifying their modern age by their poorness of outline and bad arrangement; its nearly perfect preservation, however, renders it a good explanation, in its plan and general construction, for the more ruined but more interesting Temples farther on; the great square court succeeding the pylons usual in the larger temples, is here wanting, but the magnificent Portico makes up for the loss. This portico, leading to the fine hall and lofty adytum within, has scarcely even a chip on the stone,—it is supported by twenty-four grand columns with square capitals, to which the colossal face of Athor is affixed on each side, — very sweet and dignified is the head, however singular the adaptation of a small pylon which is inserted below the abacus as her head-dress; the whole front is richly covered with hieroglyphics. There are a number of other buildings near this, much ruined; one is a Temple of the class that Champollion calls “mammeisi,” where the child of Athor is supposed to be born — this is Ehu, the young god of day or light, born of Ra, the sun, and Athor, the morning star: — this Temple is covered with representations of Typhon, the god of darkness, with whom Ra is in continual combat, and to whom the birth of the child is a fresh disaster. Outside the wall of the large Temple is a portrait of the famous Cleopatra, — she has a fat, chubby face, and is not very much prettier than the lion-headed gurgoyles which surround the roof, as grotesque in form as any mediæval monsters.

For the study of hieroglyphics, there is no place, after Thebes, to be compared to Abydos; and in descending the Nile, the difference in them, to the eyes that have looked on Kalabshee, Philæ, and Denderah, is very glaring; there is a neatness and precision here, an evident meaning vigorously expressed, even to those who cannot read them, which strikes the most cursory glance; while in some of the late Ptolemaic Temples they seem only pictures stuck on as ornament; they are here conveyed, too, by a fine medium, the walls of the now ruined sanctuary and chambers being lined with slabs of alabaster, and finished with all the princely richness and fine execution of Rameses the Great. I remember three most living figures, larger than life, sculptured on one wall, with something like chain mail over the head and the dress ; and the plaited hair and embroidery all conveyed with the utmost delicacy of finish. The other building—the Temple-palace of Seti (or Osirei) I.—was last year uncovered ; it was finished by his son Rameses the Great, and is very rich and large ; the bas-reliefs are the most beautiful in Egypt,—indeed there is nothing equal to them in Egyptian art, except the paintings in the Tomb of this same king Seti at Thebes. In earlier periods art was far more naturalistic, some of the statues found by M. Mariette being really as natural as Roman art ; but what we may call Egyptian art proper was in the reign of Seti the most perfect of all,—it is beautiful, living, and highly picturesque, although completely subject to the arbitrary rules imposed by the Priests on the artists, in accordance with that elaborate theocratic system of government that extended through all the minutiae of life. Here at Abydos stood, it is supposed, the city of This, the birth-place of Menes, and the capital of Upper Egypt long before the rise of Thebes, and at least 1300 years before the time of Rameses the Great, who lived about as long before Christ.*

I think the ride to Abydos was the prettiest and pleasantest we enjoyed in Egypt ; we had good little donkeys, who took us there in about three hours and a half, through green fields of flourishing sugar-cane, bean, and dhourra crops, with every here and there a grove of shady trees, and buffaloes in large herds feeding on the plain. The sun was hot enough without being fierce, and there was only too much of a cool breeze, delightful in the fields, but very disagreeable when we reached the ruined city, which lies under many fathoms of loose sand. The path was gay with passengers, all of a very dark swarthy brown, and in the village we found troops of pleasant-looking women, and naked shining-skinned children, who seemed more obliging than usual, offering us dates and water as we passed by. Then there were camels old and young, feeding round a pretty little natural pond shaded by palm trees.

* Wilkinson's Chronology.

We were very much detained by contrary winds the whole way down from Thebes to Cairo—day after day the same head wind blew, with only the cessation of three or four hours now and then, and frequently with so much violence that it was impossible to proceed; then, after enduring a variety of unpleasant collisions with the small waves, we hauled to and lay bumping on the bank. The process of drifting down is not an agreeable one,—the boat generally gets near the middle of the stream, and spins slowly round and round and round as it goes on, and in any wind it drifts with a kind of heavy ground swell motion, which makes many people qualmish. The sailors row a good deal, but in head winds it is labour thrown away. We sometimes found pleasant walks on shore, especially in the lovely gardens of Siout and Minyeh, but the wind was often too high even for walking. We had intended to stop in coming down, to see the Red and White Convents, and many other things, but we were now, in truth, only anxious to get on. One morning very early, however, we started to see the Cave of Diana, the Speos Artemidos, by no means to be missed by any traveller: it lies in the midst of a wild desert ravine of broken rocks, and is excavated from the mountain side, leaving in front a portico of eight square pillars, with an inner chamber containing a large niche, probably for the statue of the goddess Pasht, “the beautiful lady of the cavern,” to whom the excavation was dedicated by Thothmes III. and Seti (or Osirei) I. Lions and cats, the animals sacred to Pasht, have been buried in numbers of grottoes hollowed out in these rocks, and some of the larger Tombs in the ravine contain a few hieroglyphics.

From this the deeply interesting Tombs of Beni Hassan are soon reached, but they occupy a long time in examining; they are, next to the Pyramids, the oldest records in Egypt, some of them being of the time of Osirtasen I. and II., with the name of Suphis, the builder of the Great Pyramid, introduced in one of the inscriptions. Yet no colours anywhere in Egypt are fresher, and no paintings more vigorously and admirably executed: they contain vivid representations of every trade, occupation, amusement, and mode of life known to the Egyptians, besides a hundred other subjects far too numerous to describe or even to mention. The porticoes of two or three of the southern Tombs are ornamented with polygonal columns, the representation of the stalks of plants, bound together, with a lotus-bud for the capital; and one is considered to be the original from which the Doric Temple at Corinth was copied; in others the column is the same, without any capital or fillet beneath the abacus. It is pleasant to linger among these Tombs, and to examine them narrowly; my own feeling is strong that they should be studied in ascending the Nile, for the sooner the eye is accustomed to good hieroglyphics and the best Egyptian art, the better: after becoming even only a little familiar with them, one's enjoyment of the finest and oldest Temples is doubled and trebled to what it is if the eye has not learned to distinguish easily between the ancient reality and the modern imitation. One should never lose an hour of favourable wind in ascending the Nile, nor stop for anything (even the all-important daily milk!) should there be a chance of a good breeze: but the few, very few miles gained by a whole day's tracking are worth nothing in comparison to the knowledge thus gained in preparation for the Nubian and other Temples: Thebes, indeed, on both sides of the river, should be left till the last of all—unspoiled by even a glance in ascending: and after it has been seen, the slowest downward drifting without landing, is scarcely enough for arranging all the knowledge one has gained there clearly in one's mind.

The last excursion we made before arriving at Gheezeh was to visit the site of Memphis, the first city of which even a legend still exists in Egypt: it is believed to have been built by Menes, the first king, whose date is given between 3640 and 2700 before Christ, and some hundreds of years prior to the building of the Pyramids: it continued to be the capital of Lower Egypt throughout the glory of Thebes and long after its fall; in fact, until the rise of Alexandria robbed it of its commerce. It was still a city in the time of the Mohammedan conquest, 600 years after Christ: but, unlike Thebes, not a trace remains of its magnificent Temples, and only a few green mounds and some broken statues, guide the antiquary to its long-forgotten site.

A short ride from the village of Bedreshayn brings the traveller to that called Mitrahenny, where, prone on its face, lies the statue of Rameses the Great, forty-three feet high, and finely carved in a hard limestone, which was probably polished: the beautiful features (which can fortunately still be seen, from the ground sloping away from under the face) are in perfect preservation, and recall their brother portraits at Abou Simbil to the mind. There is also a broken statue further on, about eight feet smaller, of another Rameses, and many fragments and broken bits of sculpture lie scattered about, besides smaller pieces arranged with some care by the villagers in a little mud enclosure. We could not loiter under the fine trees that shade the village, nor even by the ugly ruin of the Sakhārah Pyramid, for we were hastening on to the Serapeum, the happy discovery made by Mariette in 1851, of the enormous Tomb of all the Apis bulls. This remarkable excavation is one long winding passage, sixteen feet wide, and fourteen feet high, with large recesses on a level of some four or five feet lower at each side; in these recesses we counted thirty sarcophagi, only a very few were empty. It is almost incomprehensible how these sarcophagi, each thirteen feet by eight, and eleven feet high, could have been drawn along the passage; they are all of fine granite, some reddish from Assouān, some of a dark green nearly black, which stone is said, I know not on what authority, to come from the mountains of the Dead Sea—which does not seem likely. One sarcophagus was of basalt,—the hieroglyphics were remarkably small and delicately cut, and the granite was in some of them polished: they are, I believe, the finest sarcophagi ever discovered, and they are, indeed, wonderful masses. No Apis bones have been discovered in them; all that have been opened were found filled with stones, as a mark of contempt. Apis was called “the living image of Osiris,”—his name is probably an adaptation of a Coptic word meaning “conceal,”* as Osiris was concealed under his form; his body was black, Plutarch says, but he had a white triangle or star upon his forehead, the spot where the spirit was supposed to enter into him: on his back there was the mark of a vulture, a beetle under his tongue, and his tail was double, — all which was, of course, managed by the priests. In fact, this Apis-worship shows what a monstrous system of priestly imposture the religion had become: how hard it must have been for the spiritually-minded, in these later times, to get at the ground-work of deep truth that underlay many of the myths with which the Priests had covered it, and changed it, as far as the ignorant and vulgar went, into a degrading and gross idolatry!

* Osburn.

But these are things to sigh over, and to think upon with an earnest, grave attention; what people find “so amusing” in the “bulls and cats,” I never could understand; one would think that even the most frivolous would be sobered, and the most trifling impressed into something like reverence after a few days at Thebes; yet even in the silent solemnity of the Valley of the Dead Kings, one’s mind is jarred and worried with the strangest and most disagreeable contrasts; one may be lost to all the realities around one, and then be interrupted, as we were one day, by a voice close to one’s ear, calling to the unhappy dragoon, “I say — you there — awsk that feller oose tomb this is!” Being answered “Belzoni’s tomb,” the owner of the voice says he believes “that was the name of the king who built Abou Simbil;” and then he goes back to his dahabieh and his dinner, and confidently remarks to his neighbour, after his champagne, “I say — wawt a bawr these tombs are! Egypt’s quite a sell for a man like me!” in which latter sentiment we agree with him.

CHAP. VI.

A MODERN EXODUS "IN HASTE."

"Nay, certainly, I have heard the Ptolemies' pyramises are very goodly things: without contradiction I have heard that."

SHAKESPEARE.

As we knew we should not have much time at our disposal for sight-seeing when once we had reached Cairo, we determined to visit the Pyramids from Gheezeh, this being a quieter and shorter ride than from the city. The heat was becoming greater every day, and those who wish to examine them in any degree of comfort or see the view in bright tints, should leave their dahabieh before sunrise, taking breakfast with them: we did not start till 9 A.M., and only reached the Pyramids towards midday, when all the beauty of colouring had faded into the hot white glare, which is as painful as it is ugly. The path was for some way fresh with pleasant verdure, and crowded with Arabs, laden camels and donkeys; then at last we emerged on the dry loose sands, and had neither thoughts nor eyes for anything but the Pyramids. Their appearance, however, is very disappointing as one approaches them — I was not at all prepared to find how much so: the deception caused by every line sloping away from the eye is inconceivably great, and not even a column raised beside them would correct the natural error, since the pyramidal form would still give the idea of something foreshortened ; I had to keep repeating to myself that the tower of Strasbourg Cathedral might stand beneath the apex, and I found even then I did not quite believe my own reasoning about it.

We were soon in the usual mob of fellaheen anxious to be chosen as assistants for the ascent, on account of whom we had previously determined to forego a visit to the Pyramids unless we could join a party with gentlemen, for they are an unruly and turbulent set, and only a very short time before a most unpleasant attack had been made by them upon a couple of gentlemen, and some blood been shed ; the fellaheen had probably been roughly treated, as the gentlemen in question were Americans, and I believe that a little quiet firmness, with the declaration that you are English, and the determination not to be put into a passion by their noisy and extortionate demands, will soon secure the comparative comfort of the traveller. But one must make up one's mind to purchase the interesting result of examining the Pyramids, by a thoroughly disagreeable process in every way ; I am most glad to have done it, but nothing would induce me to repeat the operation, and I would earnestly dissuade any and every lady who is not entirely sure of her own nerves and self-control, and who is not very strong, from attempting it. Gentlemen who go to Egypt on account of delicate lungs or imperfect circulation, probably do themselves as much injury by the effort of visiting either the outside or inside of the Pyramid, as the delightful climate is calculated to do them good ; still worse if they indulge in the absurd school-boy emulation of who can get up first.

The only right way to get through the ordeal is to be quietly passive in the hands of the three Arabs apportioned to each visitor. When once you have commenced the real business, they are good-natured and careful fellows, proud of their knowledge of half a dozen sentences in half a dozen languages, and anxious to please you ; they know best how to tie up your garments so that they shall not impede your progress, and how to lift you with least exertion or disagreeability to yourself, and the sole piece of advice I give to my countrywomen is, to let them lift you, and — to leave your crinoline in Cairo. Many of the stones are four feet in height, but the Arabs lift you at one jump with more ease than a stool or any other contrivance will afford you ; sometimes too they appear to mistake you for a doll or a swaddled baby, and you find yourself seized by the ankles as well as by the arms ! Even thus passively impelled upwards, the ascent is an enormous fatigue to both blood and breath.

The now broken summit affords a platform of thirty-two feet square, with stones upon which and beside which you can rest comfortably ; the view is fine, and interesting as being characteristic of Egypt, and should, I think, be viewed at the commencement of the traveller's stay in the country, thus taking in, at one glance, what you learn by slow degrees afterwards. Cairo, with its uncountable minarets, the most varied in form and the most picturesque in the world, rising upon the steep slope of the Mokhuttum hills, up to the citadel and the mosque of Muhammed 'Ali, is a remarkable view in itself ; still more so the clearly-marked boundaries of the wide sandy desert, so melancholy and bare-looking, from the verdant smiling plain studded with palm trees which adjoins it : while the pyramids of Abouseer, Sakkhara, and Dashoor, to the south, give a sort of still life to the scene. In the early morning or evening, doubtless, the view becomes as beautiful as it is striking, when even the featureless desolate sand of the Desert gains for a few moments the hues of a wild stern beauty peculiarly its own.

An American gentleman arrived on the summit, while we were there, and breathlessly informed us that the English Ministry was entirely changed, that England had declared war against nearly all Europe, and that the Old world was soon going to pieces. Those who never stir beyond the reach of some kind of newspaper or letters, can hardly imagine the excitement with which one greedily sucks up all the news one can get, after three months of perfect silence from the civilised world ; but the feeling was still more curious of realising the vivid interest one felt in a thing of to-day,—whether one man or another was living “his little hour” in the new history of a tiny island 2000 miles away,—in comparison with that singular scene actually near to our eyes, but which we seemed to be looking through, with apparent clearness and almost personal interest in the men of such hoary antiquity as to be far beyond the count of Time. I felt the incongruity, but I could not think on the burning fiery furnace of that platform ; my mind too was nervously fixed upon the horrors of the descent that awaited me. I found it by no means so difficult, but infinitely more disagreeable than the ascent. It was a very happy moment to me when I reached the bottom and found my sister standing, with the full complement of her limbs, in peace and comfort beside me : one had not felt one’s legs or arms one’s own in either the up or down ordeal.

We rested some minutes in the shade before we entered the Pyramid. I think not less than eighteen Arabs went in with us ; and it is impossible to describe the stifling feeling in the narrow passages, filled with noise, lights, heat, and smoke. I did not perceive in myself any sensation of horror or fear, so frequently felt by even the strongest-nerved travellers, but I confess that, according to the proverb of the "burnt child," the dread of fire came strongly upon me ; we were above a score of persons, obliged to crouch quite on all-fours for many yards together, the flames of our candles flaring about in the draught which we made in passing, and my sister and I wore Arab cotton dresses, on which one spark alighting — and many flew about — would have put us in a blaze, while any rush in those stifling passages must have been fatal to some one. The steep angle in which they dip, and their smooth surface, oblige one to have recourse to the barefooted Arabs for support, and their close company is considerably more disagreeable here than in the open air outside. But the passage is soon done ; and after visiting a small empty chamber, nearly square, called the Queen's, — which is only interesting because it stands directly under the apex of the Pyramid, — you pass through a gallery twenty-eight feet high, the walls meeting at the top by progressive steps, and enter the King's chamber, an oblong room nineteen feet high. There are small holes or tubes in the walls of this chamber to admit ventilation, and over it are four large spaces, one above the other (which Sir G. Wilkinson naïvely calls entresols, in spite of their eternal darkness), intended to relieve the weight of the mass above them. In the two uppermost of these chambers the two stones were found on which the workmen had painted the names of the kings for whose mausoleum the Pyramid was built, — Shofu (or Suphis, commonly called Cheops) and Nou (or Nef) Shofu, two brothers who reigned together, the one for fifty years, and the other for fifty-six years; their cartouches have been found in the rock-cut tombs close by, as well as the gold ring of King Suphis.

The chamber is formed of blocks of granite, cut smooth*, which sparkle in the torchlight, so exquisitely joined that the seams are almost imperceptible, and at one end is the broken sarcophagus of the King, it is supposed, made of red granite, and still emitting a bell-sound when struck. It was a fine idea of those old Egyptians, as Herodotus tells us, that of admitting the waters of the life-giving Nile to enclose the dead body of the king, who in life "called the Nile his own," in its watery arms, thus insulating it from all earthly contact; but antiquaries have ruthlessly declared the tale to be less than a fable, a total impossibility. The overpowering feeling of immensity, while thus descending lower and lower into the interior of the Pyramid, is certainly very great and never to be forgotten; it is doubtless very much increased by the quickening of the pulse, in the hurried rush down passages and up again, and by the difficulty of respiration. I felt something of the same kind afterwards in the cave of Adullam (near Hebron), the perilous path leading to which naturally hastens one's circulation a little; but there the habitual confidence of man in Nature and her glorious works has a soothing, strengthening influence, while inside the Pyramid one finds a vague feeling of fear steal involuntarily over one, as one calculates the giant mass of human-raised Titan blocks around and above one. I am sure the man who invented the horrible tale of the prison whose walls gradually closed in day by day on the unfortunate prisoner confined between them, had once stood inside that King's chamber; but I remember comparing myself mentally to the little almond I had seen so gently and quietly cracked by the wonderfully regulated power of the giant "Nasmyth's hammer," which but a moment before had drilled holes through a massive bar of iron as easily as a needle passes through fine cambric—the monstrous mass above me, however, remained unmoved, and the fate of the small almond was not mine.

* The rest of the Pyramid is built of limestone.

The next half-hour was pleasantly spent resting under the shadow of one of the enormous blocks of which the lower tiers of the Pyramids are composed. Of course the finish given by the triangular stones, which made the surfaces of the sides smooth, must have added much to their appearance, but they are more picturesque as they are, with their rugged steps.

We saw the Sphinx in her very worst light, the glare of 2 P.M.: then all colouring is spoilt, the poetry of Nature silent, and the surrounding scene rendered as ugly as it can be. And yet it impressed me as much as anything I have seen: like the Pyramids, it is impossible to form any idea of its size, from the fine proportion kept in all its parts, until the Arabs climb like ants over the neck and head. The features have been beautiful, but they are now so much destroyed that the mind must be full of those perfect faces seen in Abou-Simbil, &c., to fill up the gaps for oneself: like them, it is more than wonderful how such exquisite harmony could be preserved in the 172 feet long of the figure and the 28 feet of the face cut out from the natural rock. In spite of fractures and discolourments it still retains its "mild and bland" expression: unimaginably grand it must have been when the bearded chin overhung the temple and the altar between its paws, and the group of lions crouched in front. It is believed to have been executed by Thothmes III., who was fond of architectural caprices, but we must all be thankful to him for a "caprice" as grand and enduring and noble as this. It is a marvellous mystery, keeping its own secret behind those wide-open eyes and within that serenely smiling mouth, and one wanders round it, vainly searching for the key to what one feels instinctively is full of meaning, but which is now, and perhaps for ever, locked beneath the eternal veil of sand.

That evening we went on to Cairo, and arrived at Shephard's hotel on the 25th of March, and for the next ten days we were employed in a ceaseless labour of shopping—wearisome enough anywhere, but at Cairo really dreadful: one hunted the whole day for some indispensable trifle, seldom having the slightest idea where to go to, and at the end of the day found the thing in the first shop one had been in. We were soon in despair at the invariable answer to all inquiries for articles, that they had none; but a Cairo lady, who was so kind as to help us very much in our difficulties, assured us that meant only laziness, and at last we learnt to answer "We will help you to look for it," and by dint of opening drawers and searching for ourselves, we sometimes found what we wanted. But one never could guess where to look for anything: for instance, we found books and trunks at the tailor's, boots and shoes at a watchmaker's, a French dressmaker behind a butcher's stall, and some strong useful dresses at a warehouse for glass beads. Many things we never found at all, and we had to get on as best we could till they were sent out to us from England after some months of small discomforts. Everything European was, of course, enormously dear, and our wardrobes, even the very queer medley they were, cost us certainly three times their real value. We were, of course, constantly in the bazaars, which, though very amusing to see, are tedious and provoking to the last degree when one wants to get any real business done, and excessively fatiguing. The sirocco and heat became very oppressive; the noise and bustle of the city after being so long quiet on the river was very trying to nerves that were already a good deal shaken. The hotel was very full of passers-by, and the few friends we had came and went without being able to help us; the unjust demands of our quondam dragoman grew daily more annoying, and we soon perceived that the proceedings of the Arab court regarding the loss of the dahabieh might be far worse than the misery caused by any Circumlocution Office ever set up in a civilised country where truth, honour, and honesty are at least words understood by all: they do not seem to exist in the modern Arabic used in Cairo.

Of the city, which we were longing to examine, we saw little or nothing; only once or twice, by way of rest after our weary work, we went up to the splendid Mosque of Muhammed 'Ali, to enjoy the magnificent view. The famous view of Damascus is far more really beautiful, but there is a singularity and a grandeur about Cairo, the mingling of the works of man, in the thousand domes and minarets, with the desolate face of Nature, the verdant cultivation beside the barren waste of sand, that is unspeakably impressive. One day we paid a hasty visit to the four finest Mosques of the city, those of Sultan Hassan, El Touloun, El Azhar, and Hassaneen: they are well worth seeing, grand, simple, and interesting, with bits here and there of admirable richness and beauty. We found most of the persons who admitted us, civil as showmen and tolerably intelligent, and we were careful to show the decent attention due from one worshipper to another; so, not being provided with overalls, we walked through the mosques in stockings, — a not very comfortable proceeding, but one must have very little of the spirit of Christianity in one, and still less worldly good-breeding, if one refuses such conformity to their notions of reverence.

The minarets of the Mosques of El Azhar “the splendid,” Barkook, Nasr Muhammed, and Hassan are beautiful; the domes too are sometimes elaborately and elegantly worked. But the buildings which charmed us most were the Tombs of the Mam’look Kings outside the town, full of variety and of singular elegance: they stand in the loose sand, and should be visited early or late to avoid the heat of the sun, but they will well repay a visit at any time, and artists would find among them subjects for many months of drawing.

One Sunday morning we got up an hour or two before sunrise, having arranged with a Copt dragoman to take us to the Coptic service which was celebrated in a small old Church while their large one was being enlarged and repaired: it commences always at the first dawn of day. We found an oblong room with latticed windows, cleanly whitewashed and hung round with pictures of saints, some of which were not bad, and a part of it latticed off at one end for the women. On the north side there was a recess the whole length of the Church, like an aisle, but nearly dark: one half of this was the chancel enclosed within a screen; in front of the other half stood the Patriarch’s chair and the reading-desks. As each Copt came in he crossed the Church, and, going into the back of the recess, washed his hands in a little running fountain in one corner; then returning into the Church, squatted on the floor among the rest of the congregation. At first the service consisted of short readings of the Gospels, each portion read first in Coptic, then in Arabic, by little boys ten or twelve years of age, dressed in a kind of surplice over crimson silk, with caps, embroidered in gold, on their heads; these were the deacons. There were also several priests who wore crowns with gilt crosses on their heads, and robes of various coloured stuffs. There was chanting besides, and bells chimed in now and then, which sounded like cymbals. After about an hour of this the Patriarch,—the successor of the Apostle St. Mark, and the spiritual Head of the Egyptian Church,—entered the Church from behind the chancel, clothed in a magnificent mantle of green and gold tissue, with an enormous hood of the same, which almost hid his face; he held a beautiful patriarchal staff in his hand with a silver crozier on the top, surmounted by the figure of a knight slaying a dragon,—that universal legend, found in nearly every country where any “ancient story” existed, typifying, each according to the local colouring in which it was found, the triumph of pure-hearted courage over brute wickedness. In his other hand the Patriarch carried a small gold cross, jewelled, and wrapped in a handkerchief of gold tissue, which each person who passed him stopped to kiss.

The readings continued for some time with many short prayers and sentences, the people responding with uplifted and waving hands, often repeating “Kyrie eleeson, Kyrie eleeson.” After this the Patriarch preached a short but very energetic sermon, stopping continually, both in the reading and the sermon, whenever he saw anything amiss in the congregation; calling out very loud orders to them, "Oh! ye donkeys, don't make such a noise!" "Give more room to each other!" "Oh! ye pigs, attend and listen!" the people also frequently expressing their approbation of what he said in his sermon, with a loud murmur of applause and the words "taïb, taïb." Then he retired into the chancel, and seemed, with the priests, to make processions round the altar, and to consecrate the holy Elements; after which small cakes, circular, and stamped with the name of Christ, a cross, and some other words, were handed about, and bought by many (for five paras each) to take home. These are not consecrated, but, having been prepared for the Eucharistic bread, are considered semi-sacred, perhaps lucky. After a pause, some members of the congregation went to the door of the chancel, where the Patriarch gave them the bread and the wine together in a spoon from a glass he held in one hand, at the same time laying the edge of his hand across the eyebrows of each while he gave his blessing. The people made numbers of responses in this part of the service, not one having any book, and they recited together the Creed, the Sanctus, and the Lord's Prayer, the service seeming, as well as we could make out, to be arranged very much the same as our own. The whole service was exceedingly chaleureuse, not merely a duo or quartett of priests, with the congregation as audience, according to the fashion of some of our Churches at home, but all the people joining in very frequently, and with apparent devotion. At the end of it, the kiss of peace was passed round, each one to his neighbour, the Patriarch kissing the priests and blessing them. The women did not enter any part of the Church but that screened behind their lattice; two of the priests carried the Sacrament to them; and they joined in the responses very frequently.

The service is read in Arabic as well as Coptic, because very few of the people readily understand the latter now; but the liturgy and all their religious books are written in it, and they are instructed at school to pray, both in Church and in private, in that language. The Copt is enjoined to pray seven times in the course of each day, and Mr. Lane says he believes there are very few who do not practise the rule; and the educated Copts repeat in their prayers the whole book of Psalms every day; they also keep long and rigid fasts. We heard afterwards that the Patriarch is much beloved by the people*; he is still a young man, and has a fine countenance, with a very black, thick beard, and bushy eyebrows, which he knit ominously when he scolded them. We were told by those who knew him well, that the present Patriarch is an earnest, energetic man, bent on reform, which he is endeavouring to carry out, as well as, by means of judicious and enlightened education, to elevate the minds of his flock. He entered frankly and earnestly into an elaborate argument, or rather explanation, of the difference between the Coptic and Anglican faiths, with a friend of ours some time after, and seemed as much interested in the details given him as he was evidently pleased at the impression made by the Coptic service on an Englishman. We thought it one of the most interesting services we had ever attended.

The Coptic creed is very similar to that of the Euty-chians (who were condemned as heretics by the Council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451), with some admixture of the tenets held by the Jacobites and Monophysites; their rites and ceremonies have been preserved with but little alteration for the last fourteen hundred years. The Copts are undoubtedly descendants of the ancient Egyptians, says Mr. Lane, but they are very far from being a pure race, having intermarried, long before the conquest of Egypt by the Arabs, with their Christian brethren of Abyssinia (who were Jacobites), Nubians, and Greeks. The name of Copt is thought to be derived from the ancient Greek name of Egypt, Ægyptos, or else from the city of Coptos in Upper Egypt, to which numbers of Christian Egyptians retired in the time of the Roman persecutions ; the word is pronounced Gkubt or Gkibt, in the singular Gkubtee or Gkibtee.

* He died a few months ago.

After a fortnight's stay in Cairo, during which the examinations of our English servants and of the sailors were constantly repeated, each repetition bringing out some new variety of absurd falsehood in the history of the boat-burning, we learnt one morning from the English Acting-Vice-Consul that the story next to be adopted was that our maid had set the boat on fire, and that on this plea the dragoman Achmet Adgwa, owner of the boat, intended to sue us for 900*l.* damages.

On first arriving in Cairo we had been strongly advised to institute proceedings against Achmet for the recovery of our losses, which we estimated at considerably above 300*l.*, since our contract with him included our safe conduct and indemnity from accident during the three months of our voyage. Many said we owed at least the form of instituting such a claim, to future Nile travellers, the safety of whose persons as well as property is at the mercy of their dragomans and crews, who should, therefore, be made fully aware that they are held responsible for injury suffered by one or the other, unless caused by the traveller's own fault. But even the knowledge that we need not enforce the payment in the end, did not reconcile us to the appearance of harshness against a fellow-sufferer ; and we felt more disposed to exert ourselves to effect some compensation for his losses, with which experience had taught us so well how to sympathise.

But now the case was changed ; from what we heard, Achmet seemed to be restrained within no limits in the false and injurious stories he was spreading everywhere about us ; we knew him, from his own account, to be possessed of property in land and cows, unusually large for one of his class, and we heard now that he had expended much of this (as well as money begged and borrowed for the "maintaining of his cause") in bribing the members of the court from whom he hoped for a decision in his favour.

Under these circumstances the Consul was so kind as to step somewhat out of the course which he would have felt to be right in his public capacity of Consul, as he said, in consideration of our being ladies alone in a foreign land and among such a people, and he advised us to leave Cairo as quickly and as quietly as we could ; he assured us that the final decision of the cause would not be at all affected in this country by considerations of truth or justice, and would probably be protracted to the very utmost limit that ingenuity could devise, or during which bribes could be supplied, detaining us thus prisoners, during many a long month of summer heat, in Cairo, to the great risk of our health, which had already suffered much from the shock and subsequent anxiety.

Unfortunately for us, just at this time there was really no Consul either at Cairo or Alexandria ; our excellent friend Mr. Green had gone, and his successor had not yet arrived, and there was the same transition state of affairs in the Consulate at Cairo; and thus, while everybody was acting for some one else, nobody liked to take any responsibility on himself, or to come forward in an affair not very simple, and not very distinctly his own.

We therefore lost no time in paying to our dragoman all that we owed him for the hire of his boat, and his wages up to the last day of our stay in Cairo, as if he had still been in our service there, which of course he could have no claim to ask: the sailors we paid up to the same day also, as we learnt that in the prison their supply of food depended on their own funds; and then, after passing the night in packing, we left Cairo by the early morning train for Alexandria, feeling even then how little pleasant it was for Britons to flee! especially when they had truth and right to stand on; but remembering also that "prudence is the better part of valour," especially when the Britons happen to be ladies.

But rest was not to come yet; we had a very fatiguing journey of thirteen hours (something was amiss in crossing the river which detained us far beyond our time), and we hoped to remain a few days in Alexandria to obtain the rest which had become so needful for us. However, a friend who was so kind as to act as our deputy in announcing our arrival to the Acting-Vice-Consul early the next morning, chiefly as a matter of precaution, brought us back a most emphatic message of advice to quit Egypt immediately; — he was aware that an order for our detention had arrived in Alexandria, though it had not yet reached his office; and though the preferring such a claim on us, to use his own expression, was "simply infamous," there was too little hope of justice in an Arab court, not to make it most important that we should not be exposed to the exercise of its power, and therefore his advice was, that we should go immediately on board any vessel in the harbour whose steam we should see up, without waiting to ascertain its destination; and he added significantly, "I trust the ladies will be gone before I am in my office." So advised, we lost not a moment in driving down to the harbour, leaving even the conveyance of our baggage to the kindness of a friend, who brought it after us to the Austrian steamer, which, fortunately for us, was just starting for Smyrna; nor would it be easy to tell the immense relief we felt, after so much anxiety and turmoil, when the screw beneath our feet began to revolve, and Egypt—with all her inexhaustible and high interests, her indescribable beauties, her manifold charms, and, to us, her many troubles—was left on the far horizon.

CHAP. VII.

WHERE HOMER LIVED AND SAPPHO SANG.

THE "Archiduchessa Carolina," though a fine little boat and very clean and comfortable, did not prove a berth of roses to us; a terrible storm on the second day blew us back a considerable distance towards Egypt, as if our evil destiny would force us into the jaws of an awkward position, and instead of a three days' passage we had the benefit of five. On the evening of the third day, however, we were able to enjoy the exceeding beauty of the Islands after passing between Scarpanto and the southern end of the island of Rhodes. On the following morning our eyes opened on a grand, mountain mass of violet hue, — an awful colour, deep as the ripest autumn plum, mysteriously dark; solemnly the huge rock rose from the sapphire sea, which folded it round in waves of indescribable blue, while heavy masses of savage clouds now swooped down the mountain side, now rose and tore themselves asunder on the summit, leaving bare to view, ever and anon, the calm, pure snow lying in loving mantles half-way down the rock, and answering to the glistening white masses and wreaths of surf thrown up again and again in ever-changing beauty at its feet. I saw this island twice again; but never again did its sacred rocks impress me with such solemn beauty as then in that wild, April storm-sky, when I came up with my mind full of the grand old idols of Egypt, and remembered that there the Disciple whom Jesus loved,—he who taught us that God is Love, and who showed to us that love whereby, when made perfect in our own hearts, we dwell in Him and He in us, — that there he dwelt in tribulation, but in patience, when the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he saw, with spiritual eyes, the “great city, the new Jerusalem,” and wrote that heaven-born prophecy which “blessed is he that readeth;” — for this was Patmos. A large cave, in which the Beloved Apostle is supposed to have lived, is still shown: a solitary and spacious grotto about 700 feet above the sea — it is very probably a true tradition. Nikaria, Samos, and Khio (Scio) were passed successively, while the mainland presented an ever-changing outline of cliffs and bays, richly coloured and in some parts wooded. They were beautiful enough for any eye, but doubly beautiful to those accustomed to the monotonous yellows and the arid white rocks and sands of Egypt, however beautiful the colours in which sunset and distance sometimes array them. Lovely the Bay of Smyrna looked on the fifth morning when we landed at the quarantine very early in the day, and willing were we to be pleased with the clear water and the shining pebbles on the beach, the green vines and meadow-land around us; but the quarantine itself filled us with dismay. The dirty Hajj pilgrims who had crowded the deck of the “Archiduchessa Carolina,” poured into the courtyard of the wing appropriated to us, which looked forlorn enough with the iron-barred windows and doors, and the bare stone walls and floors of our prison; the three English gentlemen who had come in the same steamer were shown into one little room together; and to us, with our maid, was assigned an upper room with a staircase to ourselves, not so bad in itself, but that every room and the whole place was pervaded by the most horrible smells one could imagine. We passed the whole day sitting on the dirty floor, with nothing to do or to look at, or, what was worse, to eat, till sunset, when a boatload of beds, and food, &c., arrived from the hôtel, and we were then allowed to have our luggage, which had been kept from us all day, in order, I suppose, to see whether the Plague would burst out of the locks and straps in a visible shape.

We fortunately enjoyed a pretty view of the bay from the window of a front room, and once we walked in a paddock of long grass under the guardianship of a soldier; but it seemed bitterly cold and damp to us after Egypt, and we counted the hours of our very long five days most wearily. We were always expecting a visit of inspection from the Turkish medical officer, but no one came; and when we had fulfilled the law, the five days concluding at the very same hour as that of our arrival, we were allowed to embark in a little boat which carried us across the lovely bay to the city of Smyrna on the 15th of April. After this we never had any reason to complain of the cold, for the spring changed at once into delicious summer heat and sunshine.

We spent a pleasant fortnight enjoying the beauties of Smyrna. The town is beautifully situated at the end of the thirty-six miles of winding gulf, the sea washing the very walls of the houses, whose bright red roofs, mingled with pretty trees and gardens, rise up a very steep hill, finishing in a forest of the finest cypress trees in the world, not excepting those at Constantinople: it is really almost worth going to Smyrna only to see these trees. From the summit, which is crowned by an ancient castle, and is the site of the martyrdom of Polycarp, a noble view is obtained; the town with its bright colours and numerous Churches sweeping round at one's feet and extending partly along a creek at the right, while sloping up from the water's edge are rich meadows and fig groves, dotted here and there with the summer residences of the wealthier inhabitants of Smyrna, and with a few villages. On the north, across the creek, the fair and lovely mountains rise, backed by Mount Sipylus of ancient fame; on the south, the bay curves round westwards under the gloomy grandeur of fine dark purple and brown craggy mountains, on which, at this time, the snow was lying in light shrouds. All around, the eye discovers remains of aqueducts and other ruins, through which the new railway steers its unwavering, narrow line. I should think that there are not a great many cities in the world that can boast a much prettier panorama than Smyrna.

As to the town itself, it does not possess many fine buildings; some of the bazaars are handsome and solidly built, and there are a few pretty Churches. The streets are wide for an oriental town, and many of them are lined with European-looking private houses, which remind one of a French town; they are interspersed with trees and little gardens, and pretty cafés beside running streams. The bazaars are very amusing; there is nothing like a Levantine town for the jumble of languages one hears, and at Smyrna no one seems to think of troubling himself to select all the words of a whole sentence in any one language. Your true Smyrniote being accustomed to think in all the eight or nine he knows, mixes them up at once into an olla podrida of language without the fatigue of separating them, for he is sure that to whoever he speaks one or other word will be intelligible. You ask the price of a thing — the coin will be in one language, and the number in another ; you ask what o'clock it is, and the hour will be told in one tongue and the minutes in another, and so on. In a sentence of twelve words there are certain to be four or five languages mixed up, forming a jumble which is truly astonishing, and not a little perplexing at first.

We found the town well supplied with European goods, chiefly German, most delightful to us in filling up our many wants of the things not purchasable in Cairo ; and the change was very agreeable from the cold, listless impassiveness of the Oriental shopkeeper, who does you the favour of bestowing his goods upon you to his own entire ruin, as he assures you, though at double their value, and the brisk anxiety of the civil Lingua Franca merchant pressing his goods on your notice. Almost every shop is wreathed with strings of sponges of every variety of size, quality, and price : some nice little sponges are sold for a few halfpence, but a really good, fine sponge fetches almost as large a price in Smyrna as in England. The Broussa silk and embroidery bazaar, which is handsomely built of stone, is exceedingly gay and pretty ; but the gayest of all the bazaars is that for made-up garments, — the stalls are filled with many-coloured cloths, gay waist scarves, embroidered turban stuffs, striped and flowered silk robes of the most brilliant colours, and gold-embroidered jackets, varied with antique arms, little glass cases of delicate porcelain and amber beads, Persian carpets and shawls, and table-covers of needlework ; the sellers almost attack the unwary traveller, rushing at him with the articles generally bought by strangers, and shrieking to him on all sides, "Howadji! Señor! Ingleez! Franja! Monsieur! Signor!" &c. &c. Strings of camels pace along the streets—large untidy-looking beasts with long, thick hair hanging down from their necks, very unlike the trim, closely shaved, and more lively-looking camel of Egypt. Numbers of mules, and most gigantic donkeys, meet you at every turn. But the day for seeing Smyrna is Sunday, when all the inhabitants of the houses, high and low, sit outside their doors, in groups, on chairs placed in the carriageless streets. You walk through the Armenian quarter after midday, and you have thus an opportunity of seeing whole families, of three or four generations, dressed in French fashions, but with the large, soft, lustrous eye of the East, and the languishing, graceful gait of the South; in the Greek quarter, blue eyes and more regular features make a pleasant variety, while each and all have coquettish flowers, freshly plucked, twined with an Eastern abandon in the dark tresses of both maid and matron. The Jewesses, alas! do not exhibit themselves in the same manner to the admiring passers-by; they are said, by those admitted to their houses, to be very remarkably beautiful.

We made one pleasant day's excursion to Bournabat, a village of the citizens' summer residences; each house has its own nice garden, but every one is enclosed in a high stone wall, making all the streets seem blind, and preventing any kind of view of the lovely mountain scenery to the inhabitants within them. But we learned that this had been, till within the last four or five years, a matter of necessity not choice, since without these high walls no Frank was safe from insult from the Turks even in their own gardens. The only exception to the rule was in a new iron-railed wall, just completed round the garden of a Mr. Whittall, an English merchant of half a century's standing in Smyrna, and who is much respected and beloved by all classes. His house is the handsomest of the numerous good houses about Smyrna, and the garden is very large and charming; it has cost a large sum of money, and is still a costly luxury from the enormous expense of keeping it watered: in dry seasons the water has to be carried out from Smyrna for weeks and weeks together, and of course the thirsty soil requires a vast quantity to keep gardens of such extent in order. Seeing us at the gate, the hospitable owner was so kind as to invite us in, strangers though we were, and to show us the house and grounds, and a small but handsome Church which he has just built at his sole expense for the English community of Bournabat. In the course of the following summer, Mr. Whittal entertained Prince Alfred with a fête in his pleasant grounds.

We wandered about the village for some hours, peeping into a pretty Mosque, and a beautifully clean bath watered by the river Meles, on the banks of which the "divine Homer" sat and sang for all the generations of the world after him; and after resting in a café and being refreshed with coffee and hot bread which we took from the baker's oven—like all the shops here open to passers-by—we rattled back in the rickety char-à-banc which had brought us from Smyrna: such a pleasant hour's drive, the lovely meadows between the fine mountains clothed in the richest and brightest spring greens, beds of wild flowers on all sides, and the hedges filled with hawthorn, dogroses, and acacia blossoms, filling the air with their sweet perfume, and the Judas-tree, with its tall spikes of bright and lovely lilac flowers on the leafless branches.

The next day a friend kindly called to invite us to accompany his family to the Armenian Church in the afternoon, as it was Maunday Thursday, on which day, at vespers, the Patriarch washes the feet of twelve Bishops to commemorate our Lord's act at the Last Supper. The Church is spacious and lofty, half Italian, half Saracenic, built partly out of the ruins of ancient Churches, and having itself twice fallen down, each time immediately after its completion, to the great delight of the enemies of the Armenians. It has no architectural beauty in the interior, but it is pretty and gay, like the temples on the top of a confectioner's cake, all pink and white paint and gold, with numbers of pretty silver lamps hung from every arch. The galleries were filled with women in bonnets and hats instead of the old-fashioned and more graceful black silk scarf; the floor of the church was closely covered with tarbooshed Armenians squatting,—and as a great favour a bench was brought in, and placed for us near the altar. The service commenced with half an hour's singing performed by twenty or thirty little boys and lads, dressed in flowered white muslin tied with riband, and each holding a lighted candle as tall as himself; such singing! — screamed at the top of their lungs with so much exertion that they all got red in the face in five minutes, each one on a different note and in a different key, following his own fashion and fancy as to tune, only getting in the words to something of the same time and swing, and keeping the nose steadily shut. Then came in the Archbishop, clothed in black with a great black hood (which, however, he soon threw off, and then appeared in splendid robes of green and gold brocade), accompanied by twelve Priests or Bishops, each dressed in a different-coloured velvet robe embroidered with gold, and a large circular crown of the same colour as his dress, hooped with gold and surmounted with gold crosses.

After some more singing the Patriarch changed his robes before the altar to still finer ones of white satin covered with heavy gold embroidery; he put on a fine gold mitre, and advanced towards the people, holding a beautiful jewelled crosier in one hand and a gold cross in the other; he then preached a short but seemingly very earnest sermon in the harsh, nasal Armenian language. After this a huge silver basin was brought, which the Archbishop blessed separately with the soap and towels; he then seated himself in a squatting fashion on the floor beside it, while one by one the twelve Bishops sat for a few moments in a chair opposite to him, and placed one foot in the basin, over which the Archbishop poured some drops of water from a silver flagon; they then bowed and retired, kissing the Gospels and the Cross in his hand as they went. The service was then concluded. We had been involuntary witnesses of the preparatory process to the ceremony, for while standing about, before it was time to enter the Church, we had seen the twelve Bishops previously washing the twelve legs which were to be afterwards exhibited, in a very ordinary wooden pail in a small back room!—they had incautiously left the door open, and we had reason to think the preparatory and more thorough ablution not at all unnecessary.

On Good Friday afternoon there was a grand procession from the Patriarch's Palace to the same Church, the Bishops, dressed as on the day before, bearing pictures to excite the adoration of the people. We also went to several Greek Churches where crowds of people were streaming in and out to kiss some favourite picture in each; in the Church of San Giorgio the popular favourite was St. George, but as no one could reach the saint comfortably, they kissed the dragon with as much complacency and doubtless with as much benefit. There was a very good performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at the French Church, but the crowd was so great that we could not even get inside the door. The prettiest and most interesting sight to me of all the gorgeous ceremonies, was the Greek "announcing the Resurrection" on Easter morning; places were kindly obtained for us at the windows of the Greek Patriarch's Palace, to which we went at a little after midnight. The crowd was then assembling in the court between the palace, the Church, and the belfry (which was separated from the Church, a tall, dazzling white building, like a tower of filagree sugar on a supper-table), and service was going on in the Church. The crowd at last was packed as densely as it possibly could be, every individual bearing a long lighted candle, and nearly every one a pistol of some kind or other. Expectation and impatience got higher and higher, and the noise louder and louder, until about 2 A. M. the Patriarch and clergy came from the Church in procession, carrying a huge silver cross wreathed in artificial flowers, and mounted a low platform; after some singing there was a pause, and then, in distinct, solemn tones, he announced "Christ is risen!" In an instant all the bells burst out in loud peals, the people shouted like mad things, and every one waved his candle, and fired off his pistol again and again: the waving candles had a beautiful and quite indescribable effect—it seemed like the wind passing over a field of fiery ears of corn, burning the brighter as they bowed their heads to the breeze. Then the people separated, and the strange sight was over, and the acacia trees were left in silence and darkness: they might well wonder over their own fantastic, fairy kind of beauty during the ceremony—their white blossoms, illuminated with a soft, bright light by the thousands of candles underneath them, against the dark sky of night above their heads, looked like a white cloud bending down gently in fragrant blessing over the people. Despite our fatigue we had little sleep that night, for the whole population was in the streets, firing pistols, squibs, and crackers, without one moment's cessation, throughout that night and the next day.

Another but a sadder sight passed our windows on Easter Sunday morning,—the funeral of a young girl, the only child of a widowed Greek doctor, who is rich and much respected in the city; the funeral was therefore conducted in the grandest style. The procession commenced with a score of little boys, dressed in scarlet, carrying crosses and candles; then thirty priests, all robed in the richest brocades and the peculiar black cap of the Greek Church, one of them singing a sweet and solemn chant; then came the archbishop, robed in brocade, and mitred, carrying a gold crozier, a boy bearing his train; and after him the coffin—uncovered—painted white, and supported by bands of white satin riband: within it lay the young girl (embalmed, they said), and the face painted enough to conceal the terrible colour of Death, the body dressed in white satin, with a wreath of orange blossoms on her head, and strewn over with white roses, buds, and leaves. About a hundred gentlemen followed, wearing white hatbands, foremost among them the poor father, bowed down with grief—and no wonder, for the girl was very lovely; one could fancy her sleeping to the measured sounds of the sweet chant sung by the boys who preceded her and by the rich-voiced priest—

“A dirge for her the doubly dead in that she died so young!
For her, the fair and debonnaire, that now so lowly lies;
The life upon her dark brown hair, but not within her eyes—
The life still there upon her hair, the death upon her eyes!”

The whole scene was touching; but there is a horrible ending to it: at the grave, the corpse is taken out of the coffin and stripped of all its fine clothes and ornaments, for which a regular scuffle then ensues among the gentlemen, and happy is he who can secure the white shoes, or the wreath, or any other morsel of the finery! The corpse remains in the grave for one year, when it is taken up, and the bones put into a small bag, which is buried inside the church, the tombstone remaining as before.

All the shops in Smyrna were shut for the next few days, the people making holiday with every imaginable noise, and eating quantities of little pastry baskets filled with gay-coloured eggs; while at every door a lamb was tethered, all through Easter Sunday, decked out with flowers or ribands, as on this day everybody gives everybody a lamb, and as few can afford one for each family of his acquaintance, the lambs just accepted are passed on in fresh presentation until they have changed owners through a score of hands: even so, the custom is a great tax upon the purses of the inhabitants.

As we found that there was no steamer going to the coast of Syria for another ten days, we determined to pay a flying visit to the island of Mitylene, where our friend the English Consul, the far-famed excavator of the Mausoleum of Halicarnassus, had offered us the use of his vacant house for the summer months. We started at midday, in a dirty French steamer, bound for Constantinople, enjoying the lovely views of the gulf ending with the dark, bold promontory of Kara Bournou, which contrasted well with the yellow and red cliffs on the mainland. The wind freshened enough to make the passage very unpleasant, but we reached the island in less than eight hours. The day, however, had ended in rain, and the night was as dark as pitch. The steamer stops outside the harbour nearly two miles from the shore: if a boat has been pre-engaged to come out for you, well and good; if not, the chances are that you must go on to Constantinople, as, after dark, a Mitylene boatman would never think of an excursion on speculation. I was sorry to have missed the view of the island from the sea, as some travellers describe it to be "as majestic as it is graceful." We had, however, fortunately an introduction to one of the few Mitylene gentlemen, M. Pinto, a fellow-passenger on the voyage, and he kindly landed us in his boat. The air on the island felt warm and balmy, perfumed with the fresh spring flowers, and we almost enjoyed groping our way up to the English Consulate, where we were received by the French Consul, who had kindly prepared supper, &c., for us. The house is spacious and comfortable; we found a good library and all we could desire: our only perplexity being, that as neither of us knew a syllable of Greek, we had to send the servants to the French Consulate to get our wants and wishes explained to them, whenever we required hot water, or dinner, or anything!

The English Consulate commands a good view of this lovely island. The bright-coloured town curves round the little bay from which the mountains slope upwards, clothed in the rich hues of orange groves, pomegranates, figs, and mulberries; grey rocks cropping out sternly at the tops among the dark shades of purple heather. An old castle on the left, and two quaint lighthouses on the right, add something to the beauty of Nature, while the eye travels on across the calm blue sea, caught here and there by a graceful latteen sail, till it reaches the beautiful coast beyond; and truly there can hardly be a more beautiful coast view than that of these time-honoured mountains of Mysia, blue and hazy with light wreaths of white mist and snow; while rising straight up from the gulf of Adramytium at her feet, stands the noble and graceful peak of Mount Ida, clouds resting lightly on the summit, and shadowing the eternal snow on her crest: truly a fit resting-place for Jupiter and his attendant gods, for the noble mountain—now de-poetised into the “mountain of goats”—was once covered with pine forests, in a lovely glade of which “Beautiful Paris, evil-hearted Paris,” adjudged the apple to Aphrodite, “new-bathed in Paphian wells;” and I never looked at the grand old mountain without fancying I heard the sorrowful chant of “Mournful CEnone, beautiful-browed CEnone,” repeating—

“O mother Ida, many-fountained Ida,
Dear mother Ida! hearken ere I die!”— while one had but to walk through half a dozen of the streets of Mitylene or the villages near the town, to see girls beautiful enough for all the heroines of ancient song—even “the Greek woman” herself—with figures like statues of Phidias, and draperies that a sculptor would go wild to reproduce. Broken pieces of fine marble figures are frequently found beneath the soil on this classic ground: we saw two fine heads which had just been dug up, in one of which, the gems placed in the eye-sockets, to represent the dark iris of the eyes, had fallen out, leaving round empty holes, shadowing the eye with a softer expression than the original gems could have done. A little patience and money would soon be repaid in collecting some valuable remains,—broken, of course, but well worth having for private collections. The natural marbles of various colours, found in the island, are also said to be valuable.

We saw a new hospital, building with the stones taken from the ruins of a Temple of Apollo, which was discovered in digging the foundations: it is a pity that some of the friezes could not have been secured for the Mitylene museum, — a praiseworthy institution which ought to be supported by strangers, the European community being far too small to accomplish much, though they have acquired a wonderfully admirable collection of scientific instruments for their college, into the uses of which the Lesbian youth of the present day, we were told, enter most heartily and readily. The institution appeared to us, in our hasty glance, to be superior to many of the institutions of the same class in England.

A good many things are produced in the island, beginning with the delicious little beccafiques, of which a hundred may be shot in one tree, in a few minutes of the first hour of a spring morning; then the figs, which are small but luscious, though not as far-famed as their Smyrniote neighbours; abundance of olives, the chief commerce of the island, and some tolerable wine; besides the innumerable confitures, on the manufacture of which the Mitylene matron prides herself, and of which every visitor invariably partakes, the mother or daughter of the house bringing various kinds on a silver tray before the inevitable coffee. An amusing story is told of the consequences of the rhapsodies written by Lamartine on the confitures he tasted in visiting the hospitable house of M. and M^dme. Pinto; a few weeks after the publication of the "Voyage en Orient," letter after letter arrived by each succeeding mail, containing "orders" from Parisian confectioners for "Pinto's confiture," with special directions for its being exactly the same as that M. Lamartine had described : and for some months these letters continued, angrily reproaching the astonished and indignant M. Pinto for not attending to their "commissions!" There are also abundant truffles in the island, and, it is said, "unequalled oysters."

Another product of Mitylene is the needlework of the women, which is really ancient and beautiful. It is rarely to be met with now, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe having bought up all the best in the island, so that we thought ourselves fortunate in obtaining a few specimens of the pretty manufacture, which no modern Lesbian can imitate: at present the islanders do "broderie Anglaise," and despise the tasteful colours and elaborate patterns of their ancestors! If poor Sappho — "violet-crowned, pure, sweetly smiling Sappho" — had only stuck to her needle instead of meddling with the Muses and Aphrodite, "the fatal fire" in her heart might have remained for ever unkindled by the rejuvenated old Phaon, and the rocks of Santa Maura would not have been immortalised by a myth which I insist on believing, despite a whole library of commentators! By-the-bye, her marble coffin is shown in one of the Mosques here, which she had prepared for herself before the fatal leap was determined on.

As we wanted to see something of the far-famed beauty of the Mitylene women, we gladly accepted an invitation to a Greek fête, given in honour of St. George at a small village on the other side of the harbour. It did not seem to our ideas a very lively fête; the large gardens were filled with groups of men, women and children sitting in family parties, eating dinners which they had carried with them, and listening to very barbarous music: there was no dancing or games, and we were disappointed at seeing no costumes except among the men, who still look picturesque. The women are altogether dressed in gowns à la Européenne, of the brightest possible colours in thin sarsenets and muslins, and their pretty heads adorned with natural flowers. It is said that within a hundred years ago, the women wore only a very short petticoat, and an embroidered handkerchief over the bosom — the smallest modicum of a costume possible! They wear a great many jewels — strings upon strings of pearls most commonly, very often with diamond clasps and ear-rings,— and are certainly beautiful women, with very fine lustrous dark eyes, and graceful movements: but their sweet mouths are sadly spoiled by the effects of the rouge which they all wear from their earliest childhood, the mercury in which so affects the teeth that there is scarcely a girl in the island above the age of sixteen with any front teeth left in her head.

We took a most delicious ride one day to the Porta d'Olivieri, the second large harbour in the island, in itself large enough to contain the whole English navy, even if half our ships were Great Easterns,—Port Callone is still larger. We ascended the mountain behind the town, on our good mules, enjoying as we went the most lovely and ever-changing views of the island itself, the sea, and the opposite coast; our road was a good one, well paved and not broken into holes, sometimes steep enough for broad shallow steps. The whole way over mountain and dell was a continual variety of rich colours, forests of pine and white cypress, thick sad-coloured olive groves alternating with the fresh green of the newly leaved fig-tree, in pretty contrast with crowds of luxuriant juniper, dwarf oak, hollies, oleanders, myrtle, and many shrubs we did not know; while our mules stepped through the thickets of gum-cistus, both white and pink, growing in huge tufts everywhere; and every morsel of flat ground or "smooth swarded bower," was carpeted with the most brilliant beds of flowers, — "the crocus brake like fire," and all the mountain slopes seemed striped like gay-coloured silks, with ribands of the brightest yellow, lilac, pink, and blue. Sometimes the rocks overhung the path in perpendicular bluffs, but in general the character of the island scenery is more lovely and fine than stern and grand.

We descended in about two hours into the olive groves on the sea shore, and alighted at some ancient Baths, now used for a café. The shore, perfumed with flowering shrubs, is interesting from the multitudes of shells, sponges, and beautiful Medusæ of all colours and sizes; and the view of the tranquil water of the harbour, like a lake, from which there is apparently no outlet, surrounded by the beautiful mountains, is very lovely indeed. The ancient towns of Hiera and Pyrrha stood at the lower end of the harbour. Passing thunder showers threw a thousand colours and changing lights over the scene, so that we forgave the wetting we got in riding back, for the sake of seeing the beautiful mist-wreaths carried in haste over the opposite shore, — and the sun soon dried our garments. A short detour in returning brought us by the Leper colony, encamped among the caves of a wilder and less cultivated valley: there are a great many of these poor creatures in Mitylene; they marry among themselves, and we saw two or three very pretty young girls in the group who begged from us; sooner or later, however, it is said that the taint invariably shows itself, and the inevitable disease slowly but surely eats into the whole body, till limb after limb drops off. It is not thought to be so very painful a complaint, as its horrible appearance would seem to imply.

We returned into the town by the sheds where the Slave market used to be held, and made our way into a small Church filled with some splendid wood-carving; it is of a different style to the Venetian chef-d'œuvres of Brustolon, but quite equal to them in execution. A transparent screen stretched across the Church, composed of arabesques and wreaths of natural flowers; pulpit stalls and reading desks were all alike made of the same exquisite workmanship: we heard there was a great deal more in two or three other Churches, and that it was all the work of native artists of the olden days; it would be priceless to many a collector in England of such antique beauties, and I hope the pretty island may some day be robbed of it. Wood-carving is still a favourite employment here by the peasantry during the winter months: and we afterwards heard that the peasants in the island of Scarpanto also excel in this work. We may hope that Mitylene will one day regain her place in the commercial world: an island so easy of access, and possessing such harbours and so fruitful a soil, with an active, intelligent, and industrious population such as they are, ought indeed to be prosperous and important: but her vicissitudes have been many, though her name has been great, and at present she is under a thick cloud, called Turkish dominion. The birthplace of poets, musicians, philosophers, and historians, — a stout member of the Grecian confederacy, — she passed under the Romans, and long afterwards to the Venetians, under whose sway, probably, her fine castle was built: in 1465 she gallantly resisted the siege of the Ottoman Sultan Muhammad II., aided by a band of the Knights of St. John, until the city was betrayed to the Turks by the treachery of the governor, who paid for his baseness by an immediate execution: not a Knight remained alive after its capture. A good half of her inhabitants were destroyed in the Greek War of Independence, and in the horrible massacres of that period, which were nowhere conducted with greater brutality; but now, after a long interval of peace, one longs to see the beautiful island repopulated and prosperous, as some day — inshallah — she will be.

The “Euphrate” steamer, in which we took our passage from Smyrna to Beyrout, is one of the finest and most comfortable of all the Mediterranean steamers, not excepting even those belonging to the P. and O. Company. We had the ship nearly to ourselves, except for the addition of the Hajj — the inevitable nuisance in every Levantine voyage during the spring and summer. The pilgrims, who are continually going to, or returning from every port in the Levant, live upon the deck, which is generally divided like a sheep-pen down the middle; they are expected to keep to their own side and within the railing; but, even if they do so, the sights, sounds and odours proceeding from their locality are unpleasant to the last degree. They lie all day huddled up on their mattresses, presenting every variety of costume and Eastern language, — grandfathers, parents and infants, all pell-mell together. They bring their own provisions, and also plenty of small companions, on whose unfailing activity neither open railings nor ship regulations have the slightest effect.

The day after leaving pretty Smyrna found us threading the islands we had passed by before, — this time, however, going closer in shore, so as to catch a glimpse of Boudroum and Cnidus, and the glorious Cape Krio, which rose majestically, snow-covered, from the blue waters that foamed over its rugged feet. The evening brought us to Rhodes, whose busy little harbour looked very pretty, with its minarets and ships lighted up with lines of coloured lamps to celebrate the last night of Ramadān. We rowed on the following morning in the gig of H. M. S. Tartarus, to the inner quay, where we landed and found ourselves amongst crowds of gaily dressed Turks, hurrying in great state to pay each other visits on the close of Ramadān; from the Beys on richly caparisoned horses down to the smallest child, all were in bright clean clothes, with natural flowers stuck in bouquets into nearly every one's turban or fez; it was really gay and pretty; but nothing can save the streets of poor old Rhodes from looking desolate and deserted when one compares it in one's mind with its days of chivalry and splendour, the like of which has passed away for ever from the world. Passing by the Barracks of the Turkish soldiers, the ancient doors of which have been removed to Versailles, we found ourselves in the "Knights' Street," — once so grand — now so silent and sad. There are but few remains of the fine "Auberges," which belonged to the eight Languages of the Order: only some richly ornamented doorways and finely carved marble scutcheons in the walls, the armorial bearings on which are still very perfect; but they are much hidden by the miserable balconies, &c. of old boards and broken lattices, which have accomplished the metamorphose of the palace of a monastic Knight into the harem of a Turk. The once noble Church is now a heap of unintelligible ruin, to which state it was reduced by a singular accident: some rock-hewn caves had been used by the Knights as a store-house of gunpowder in the days of Rhodian glory, but they had long been forgotten, when, in October 1856, a flash of lightning during a severe thunderstorm ignited the gunpowder and blew the Church, the Palace of the Grand Master, and a hundred other interesting remains into utter ruin ! We were told by an English officer who witnessed the catastrophe, that he saw the Church lifted bodily into the air, from whence it fell with a shock that was felt for many miles round ; every glass window in the town was broken, and large stones wrenched from the walls beyond the outskirts of the city. One might almost say that by this powder Rhodes was twice lost : 330 years before, the fortress was “heroically lost,” and obliged to capitulate to the Turks for want of the ammunition they had buried and forgotten — and now, the last memorials, even the skeletons mouldering in the tombs of the gallant heroes of her siege, were utterly destroyed by the very means which would have saved them in their day of need !

The towers and minarets of the fortress-city mingle prettily in the views round the harbours of Rhodes, backed by the green hills and gardens which surround the town ; people still amuse themselves disputing over which harbour the famous Colossus stretched his brazen legs, but the fact is, that he was placed on the point of the rocky promontory between the two, called now the “Arab’s Tower,” — but, in the time of the Knights, St. Michael’s ; it is still a massive square tower, and was topped by the waist, bust, and head of a man covered with brazen plates, with an arm stretched out towards each of the harbours, and holding a lamp in either hand. He must have been a monster of ugliness, but he figures nowhere so amusingly as in the chronicle of the old British pilgrim Sæwulf in 1182, who recounts how St. Paul addressed his “Epistle to the

Colossians " to the men of Rhodes, because they dwelt beneath the legs of the famous Colossus !

As the steamer allowed us but two hours of daylight, we could at this time see but little of Rhodes ; but on returning in the following year we had the benefit of receiving much information from M. Salzmann — the best authority on the remains of Rhodes ; and I therefore defer any description of it till that time.

Nothing can exceed the beauty of the coast scenery of Asia Minor from Cape Krio onwards : the mountains are rugged, stern and grand, the savage wildness at times changing into varieties of luxuriant, many shaded woodlands, and green meadow-nooks — the snowy peaks in the spring and early summer rising behind the dark purple and red-browns of the nearer cliffs ; and then the sapphire water — it is said by experienced sailors, that the water near this coast is of a deeper and brighter blue than any other in the world — and one can well believe it. The beauty which extends along the whole coast attains its highest loveliness in the Gulf of Makri, and the famous Seven Capes : the outlines of the cliffs and mountains are here both grand and graceful, and the blue distances on the other side of the Gulf lend much to the scene. Kastelorizo, Khelidonia, and Anamour, are each very fine, and all abound in historical interest to the scholar. This little nine days' voyage, in a fine steamer coasting closely along under such beautiful scenery, is more than pleasant : we had lovely clear weather, and fortunately always a calm sea. The fifth day was spent at Messina, where, however, we did not land ; and the sixth in the beautiful Bay of Iskenderoon, where the Amanus mountains come down into the water, clothed in rich woods, and the beach is fringed with thickets of oleanders.

The bay is enclosed by lofty mountains, the Taurus range to the north rising in the pale blue distance, covered with snow, which seldom melts even at the end of the summer. All these mountains are full of souvenirs of the misled but gallant Crusaders. Among their precipitous ravines, and in the hot valleys and plains between their heights, not hundreds, but thousands, laid down to die or ever they saw the Promised Land of their enthusiasm *; and, of those who survived, many more passed along this great mountain road, called the "Iron Gates of Syria," though only to be slain before Antioch, Damascus, &c. Excessively hot is the Bay of Iskenderoon, and deadly the fever of the malarious plain on which the little town stands; but our walk on the sandy shore among the oleanders was delightfully pleasant.

Sunday we spent at Latakia, landing early in the tiny harbour behind a fine old tower, built on the rocks which rise insulated in the water; the shore was covered with something white, which I took for Tombs,—when, as we came nearer, I saw them move, and discovered that they were living women, wrapped in the white eezar, or sheet, with which we were afterwards to become so familiar throughout Syria. Their faces were covered entirely with the mandeel, a dark coloured cotton handkerchief of gaudy patterns, which is made at Manchester, and which we also now saw for the first time. The pretty town is surrounded with fine gardens, where we soon got quantities of roses and carnations. The streets are so frequently covered in with stone arches, even where there is no bazaar, that they are very shady and pleasant, and give a handsomer appearance to the small town than a fuller acquaintance warrants: the long vistas of arches are most picturesque, and great numbers of broken granite columns are still standing at the sides of the streets.

* The Crusaders frequently called even Northern Syria "the holy land of Jerusalem."

There are also some ruins worth seeing: one is a row of four columns with fine Corinthian capitals, still supporting a richly carved architrave and frieze; another is a Triumphal Arch, or square of four arches, with fine friezes and capitals. Their beauty was much enhanced in our eyes from their being covered with luxuriant trailing weeds, springing from between the old stones, instead of the severe aridness of the unstained Egyptian ruins, to which we had been so long accustomed. The capitals and friezes are of very rich Corinthian, and well cut; and the stone, which appears to be a soft one, is of a fine golden-brown colour now.

It is difficult among the narrow winding lanes of modern Latakia to carry its topography well in one's head, at least in the visit of a day; but it would be very interesting to map down the various remains still in situ of ancient Latakia, or rather of Laodicea-ad-Mare; there is still, however, enough to show that a double row of granite columns once made an approach the whole way from the quay on the harbour up to the Corinthian Temple, whose remains are now quite at the back of the town and at the distance of 1500 yards from the harbour. Numbers of these columns still remain, but the greater part have been broken off and rolled down to the sea, to be built into the foundations and walls of the Castle in the harbour—the memorial left there by the Venetians, and where many of them, with their rough broken-off ends, are still to be seen.

From a large Mosque, on the hill behind the town,

a very pretty view is obtained: Mount Casius on the right, and the Lebanon on the left, — the graceful bays, where sponges luxuriate, sweeping into every imaginable curve on either side. From the gardens, on the south of the little harbour, the view is also very pretty. In short, this Latakia is a gay, pretty little town, subsisting upon its merchandise of tobacco, and sponges, and remarkably delicate silver-work; the bazaars are uncommonly good for so small a place; the tobacco is brought in from all the north of Syria, to be shipped from the port, and is, when the duty on reaching home is added, very nearly as dear as in London; the sponges are gathered off the coast, chiefly from the rocks near a little bay to the north, which is occupied by the divers and seamen only. The cliffs above are filled with the rock-hewn tombs of the ancient Laodicea-maritima; they are very simple, and, of course, all of them quite empty.

Tripoli, where we spent the next day, is a handsome town, and beautifully situated on a narrow strip of plain, at the foot of the Lebanon range, which rises with abrupt loftiness directly behind the town — its strata most strangely and grotesquely marked, as if a boiling mass had been thrown out and suddenly cooled in its still seething commotion. Between the beach and the mountains are miles and miles of delicious fruit gardens — oranges, apricots, and figs, hedged with pomegranates, tangled over with clematis, and watered by thousands of tiny streamlets from the Kadisha river. Five old Castles remain: the largest of which on the seaside, built by Raymond de Toulouse, was still occupied and fitted with cannon till 1849, when the English knocked huge holes in its ancient walls; the Saracenic doorway and the interior vaultings are good, and worth seeing. Another Castle is situated in the pleasant valley of the Kadisha, a picturesque ruin; and a third crowns the mountain spur above the town, from whence there is a splendid view of the town and gardens, and of the river foaming through the rocks and woods, with the Mosque and Convent of the Derweeshes in a fine ravine.

We amused ourselves drinking coffee and eating ice in a café beside the river, listening to Arab story-tellers declaiming romances to large groups of well-dressed Tripolitans, seated in rows on stone divans along the streets, smoking nargilehs, and eating the sweet, fresh oranges which are plentiful here. The little town is a flourishing one, with good bazaars; its best production is, however, but little known: these are carpets made by the peasant girls in some of the neighbouring villages. They are very slowly made; as for each carpet the girls, or the family, gather, prepare, spin, and dye the wool themselves, which is then woven in patterns of their own design—very tasteful they are, and the colours rich and brilliant; they are very strong and thick, as well as pretty, especially the finer sorts. They cost from 100 to 500 piasters*, according to their size.

The eighth morning found us outside Beyrout, where the swell—which is ceaseless in that bay—made every one so sick, that we were thankful to get out of the ship and to settle into the pleasant Hôtel on the southern headland below the town, at Râs Beyrout; this hôtel is simply, almost barely, furnished,—the open corridor is the only general sitting-room, but the semi-naked simplicity suits the climate, and we found it at all times a delightful residence, the heat of Beyrout being here tempered by the sea breezes which blow all round it. Besides, it was the cleanest hôtel we had been in since Paris: and it is an unspeakable comfort sometimes to get into a place where you can sleep in peace without battling with scores of fleas, or worse, and where there are plentiful signs of brooms and brushes.

* From about 1*l.* to 4*l.*

CHAP. VIII.

THE "BEAUTIFUL GATE" OF SYRIA.

THE world must be very rich in beauty if there exist half-a-dozen places on its surface much more beautiful than Beyrout ; but I, for one, cannot believe that there are ; its loveliness is of many kinds, and though different pictures may combine to represent its beauties, no one will contain them all. Tripoli, Saïda, Hhaïffa, Smyrna, Mitylene, rightly lay claim to many charms,—but they do not surpass Beyrout. The amphitheatre of mountains, clothed in every hue, which change with every passing hour ; the snowy summits towering up behind them ; the rugged headlands of rocks, over which the sea dashes in ceaseless wreaths of foam ; the city rising from the water's edge, and climbing up the slopes of hills, adorned with gardens, minarets, domes, and mosques, castles and palaces ; the scattered palm-trees, and the bright colours dotting every street and quay,—make a tout-ensemble which fascinates the eye in the first moment—grows upon you under every changing light and sky—and rests in the mind an everlasting memory of loveliness.

To the north one blue headland stretches out beyond another, till the Theoprosopon (which forms one side of the Bay of Tripoli) arrests the view ; from this the mountains reach back with majestic beauty to the far East, the various heights covered with every variety of green, from meadow to pine forest; tiny white streams dash down the sides, while crags, grey, white, purple and yellow, break out from between them, and nearly every crag is crowned with the towers or walls of a monastery. In magnificent loveliness Sunnîn rises up behind them, the saddle-shaped summit covered with a thick mantle of snow, and the barren creamy-red sides stratified into terraces; then Kunîsyeh, more peaked and but little less lofty, snow-covered also; and then the mountain ranges gather round southward, still more richly clothed in wood,—and, sloping down towards Saïda and Sour in blue distance, meet the clear blue sea again at their feet. Râs Beyrout, to the right, throws out bold rocks to greet the waves, over which a coast-road in front of rich gardens speckled with houses leads into the town: lifted above all are the fine barracks, standing proudly on a hill in the midst, while a hundred palaces of the European residents and merchants of Beyrout attract the eye, each house surrounded with verandah-terraces of fantastic Saracenic arches, in various coloured marbles; in the foreground the once strong Castle of Beyrout is to be seen among the houses, and, on rocks jutting out into the little harbour, two other Castles, now picturesque ruins, pretend to protect the crowds of oddly-shaped feluccas, stout merchantmen, and scores of little boats painted all manner of bright colours, that are jammed together in struggling confusion at the custom-house quays. Some way out of the town lies the white Lazaretto, among mulberry and fruit gardens: while the golden-sanded shore curves round from beneath the old seven-arched bridge over the river, and sweeps away past myrtle-hedged villages into the smiling little Bay of Jouneh.

In the early morning sun how clear and bright and beautiful it is! Later on how busy the gay boats, and how graceful the white sails flecking all the bay! At midday how refreshing and delicious the green woods and gardens! In the afternoon how tender and indescribable become the tints, and how enchanting the perfumes that spread through the air! And in the evening, how unearthly the hues that steal over mountain, sea, and sky — dyeing the sea into a full larkspur blue, and the mountains into a soft grape-like purple, which seems, although so dark, to be semi-transparent, with deep crimson shining through the purple in some mysterious union; while the more distant summits become transfigured in a tender spiritual rose-colour, pure and lovely as a real, living, fresh-blossomed rose; and the white snow softens into a kind of pale glow, and seems ready to float away and dissolve in the rose-coloured and golden floods above. What scene on earth can be more exquisitely lovely than this? For many a month I watched all this day by day, with a thousand other changes; and, looking back through all I have seen before and since, nothing surpasses it in loveliness but the Great Desert and the Dead Sea (and they have much less variety, though not less glory of colouring), and one view of Broussa. Then at night, when the lights twinkled through the town, and the moon came out and seemed to turn the marble arcades and the minarets into molten silver, and illuminated the snow on the mountain tops,—when the stars swam in liquid light over all, and the cool refreshing night air came gliding by laden with sweets, like silent messages of whispered fragrance, and faint music stole up from the town, and the sea murmured below in soft plashings on the rocks;— then one sat and listened and looked, and longed to have it always night, until the glory of the dawn made one feel that joy is better than sadness, however sweet, and one's heart sang, "The earth is the Lord's, and the glory thereof!"

Behind all this, unseen from the sea or the town, is the delightful Pine-forest, made famous by the rhapsodies of Lamartine; it is a charming place, for though the trees are nearly all quite young, yet they throw a cool and refreshing shade upon the hot sand beneath them, and nothing can be pleasanter than an early morning or late evening gallop along the wide open glades, occasionally stopping at one of the quaint cafés for a glass of snow-lemonade, or pacing slowly under the sombre, fragrant trees on foot. The sand from the beach had blown over this part of the plain, rendering it quite a desert, until these trees were planted to prevent its drifting; and it is to be hoped that the forest will be very much extended, to form shelter for the town and gardens on the rest of the plain from the south winds.

The hot season was now beginning, and it was time for us to secure a summer residence; Beyrout, however enchanting, did not suit us, as we did not choose to remain long either in a town or in an hotel, and except in the charming palace-houses of the residents, or in the Râs Beyrout Hôtel, it is too hot a climate to be healthy for European strangers in the summer; we were longing too for mountain air and a quiet home,—so we lost no time in making inquiries and preparations for attaining both. First of all we engaged a dragoman, Habeeb Soma, the best of those at Beyrout, and whom we afterwards found, during the year he remained in our service, more honest than most of his class, invariably obliging, and particularly well-informed concerning the country;

he was a mountaineer from near Bukfeyia, and used so guttural an Arabic that we found our very limited Egyptian vocabulary of little or no use to us; but as he spoke excellent Italian and tolerable French, we had no need of anything else, and he afterwards made great progress in English under the tuition of our maid. Guided by him we mounted some ugly but good Syrian nags, and proceeded to some of the neighbouring mountain villages.

We were informed that the abode most likely to be convenient to us would be apartments in one of the numerous convents which are strewed over the Lebanon mountains; we, therefore, first bent our steps to the Convent of Mar Ronkas, where we knew a European family of ladies had spent the previous summer. At first we followed a pleasant road among gardens and fields hedged with prickly pears, and two large plantations of cactus (on which some one was trying to cultivate cochineal), the scarlet blossoms of which looked splendid; after fording the stream and pushing through thickets of lovely oleanders, we began to ascend the mountain, and the path became as bad as the scenery was beautiful; the horses scrambled over rocks like cats, with occasional bolts, jumps, and struggles that really astonished one; for this was one of the very vilest paths I ever saw, and we were quite new to such undertakings; the beauty of the scenery happily consoled one, and we reached the convent at last. It stands on a little horn of the mountain very low down, but high enough to overlook the rich and lovely plain. We pushed the gate open and found ourselves in a little court-yard full of fowls, from whence we made fruitless efforts for about half an hour to waken any of the monks — they were taking their siesta. At last one of them appeared, and learning our wishes, sent off for the superior, who soon came panting up the steep, with his black gown turned up in front, and the under skirt carefully folded out of harm's way during his digging and pruning. He made himself tidy and then joined us, sitting in a pleasant window-seat, while we sipped lemonade,—only one of us at a time though, as they possessed but one glass. The rooms he offered were tiny white-washed cells, about ten feet square each, with a hole for the window and one little shelf, and a saloon commanding but little view, and which was then filled with silkworms; we did not fancy the gîte, especially as we foresaw that the good monks would inspect us from morning till night, as if we were beasts in the Zoological Gardens, and that it would be impossible to have the cloisters to ourselves; the monks seemed good simple-hearted creatures, employed in cultivating their silkworms and little herb garden, and in prayer; we heard they were very kind to the few peasants who lived near them, helping them in the mulberry grounds, &c. They were very anxious to have us as their guests, but our bodies being already immensely impressed with the astonishing concourse of fleas in their little court, we departed, determined to look a little further.

Another day, therefore, we clomb the mountain to the village of Beit Miry, of whose charms we had heard tell even in Egypt; the road lay in the same direction, but instead of continuing to the left to Mar Ronkas, we went straight up the mountain, through brushwood and thick beds of bright flowers and shady trees,—then came a pine-wood and a long delicious hill covered all over with a low forest of myrtle just bursting into blossom and perfuming the air, as we trod through it, most enchantingly. Next we wound up through mulberry-terraces to another pine-wood, from whence paths branched off to the two horns of the mountain, one leading to the fine convent of Deir el Khullah, the other to the village of Beit Miry*: here, under the pine-trees, is the spring, trickling down the rocks, and giving birth to lovely branches of maiden-hair, and other ferns sprouting from every little crack in the rock over which the water passed. Not knowing the path, which, indeed, had little to mark it, save all the biggest and roughest of stones turned out of the terrace walls, we rode in a steeplechase fashion through the mulberry gardens, till we arrived at the Emir or Prince's house, which had been twice occupied by English families. Four very small rooms built of unplastered stones, surrounded a little court, with the village chapel and priest's house; they were little stone huts and no more; they asked a high price for the rooms, and we felt exceedingly dismayed at the prospect of spending the summer in those dirty little holes. The Emir was very civil, and his wife, the Princess, came out to stare at us; she had been lying in one of the rooms on a couch covered with rich white silk, but was herself dressed in common cotton; she was old and very ugly, and wore the disgustingly open costume of the Maronite women. This Emir was not one of the highest rank, but we were told by several people that he was very much loved and respected, and very kind in sharing his small wealth with his poorer neighbours; the meaning of the name of the village is "the house (Beit) of Emirs (Miry) or Princes."

Seeing a better looking house in the middle of the village, we rode on and asked if we could have it; it had a pleasant arcade-terrace, but was too small for us, and was not to be let till later, as it was then filled with silkworms, who would not cocoon for another month. The owner, a Druze woman, came out and invited us in to see the darkened rooms filled with the trays (made of mud mixed with straw) in which the silkworms were feeding, placed on a light wooden framework; the worms were still young, not being more than an inch long, and they were awake and feeding, but we were requested not to speak loud or to disturb them, and we beat a hasty retreat, as the silkworm nurseries have a very disagreeable smell, and are horribly lively with fleas. The mistress wore the black serge veil, supported by the long silver horn* peculiar to the Druzes, and her face was of course hidden. They draw the veil across it so as to leave only one eye uncovered, and generally hold it in their teeth, a style that is more convenient than pretty; but, indeed, nothing can be more ugly than the horn itself; it might add some dignity to the figure if it was worn standing upright like a steeple from the head, but it is fixed on the top of the forehead at an acute angle, looking like the sign-post pole over a barber's shop door, and is worse than grotesque. Once put on, at marriage, it is never removed from the head even at night.

* Pronounced Bayt Mēry.

All this time we had seen at the opposite extremity of the village a very large palatial-looking house, which we concluded belonged to some Sheikh or Emir of high rank, but on inquiry we found it had but just been completed, and was the property of three brothers, native merchants. We thought we would at least try if we could see it, and rode on to the door, where we found a large collection of horses—seven Russian officers having ridden up the mountain, were smoking and chatting in one of the rooms. The house was large and very handsomely built; it contained six lofty rooms (one of which was thirty-six feet long), and a delightful arcade in the centre; the front windows had double arches with stone mullions, with deep recesses in the thick walls; there was a second terrace at one end and a nice little garden attached to it. The view from the house was superb, overlooking the road up which we had ridden, with the whole of the exquisitely rich little plain of Beyrout spread out at one's feet, the river winding along in the midst like a silver ribbon, the town glittering in the sunshine, the beautiful Baruk mountains opposite, and a wide expanse of blue sea. Immediately behind the house rose a nearly perpendicular grey crag, two minutes' scramble up which led to the brow of the mountain, and opened out the magnificent wooded valley, or rather ravine of El Metn, on the opposite side of which rose snowy Sunnîn in all his majestic grandeur.

* Called the tantour.

We were not long in making up our minds about this delightful spot, and the price, 21l., was soon settled over lemonade and coffee; another half hour was spent in paying compliments before we descended the abominable path back to Beyrout: people said afterwards that we had given too much, but we were afraid of losing the house by hesitation. The canteen furniture belonging to the dragoman, which we had engaged for our future tour to the South, was sufficient to furnish the house enough for one's simple wants in that climate, with the addition of a table, Turkey carpets, and divans which already occupied the sitting room. We took it for three months from the 23rd May.

Meantime we employed ourselves in seeing Beyrout and the neighbourhood. There is little to see in the town. We visited some Greek, Armenian, and Maronite

Churches not particularly worthy of notice, and entered one pretty Mosque with delicately painted arabesques covering the walls and roof of the interior: service was going on, the congregation chanting and praying in unison—the music of the chant was wild and harmonious. The bazaars of Beyrout are not by any means handsome, but they contain a very fair variety and plenty of goods: one quadrangular court surrounded with arches, where silk cord and tassels are manufactured, is exceedingly picturesque, and parts of the cotton and silk bazaar would supply endless subjects for sketches. Beyrout is famous for its gold and silver work, in which the jewellers display a great deal of taste and tolerable execution; but they do not produce the best things at the first asking. There are also some very good German shops for housekeeping articles, situated near the Marina, where it was always a pleasure to go on account of the lovely view from the quay of the mountains and castles.

One day, in order to save a long ride by a short cut across the bay, we hired a small boat, and taking advantage of a fair breeze, set sail for the Nahr el Kelb—Dog River; St. George's Bay, however, is not a pleasant one for boating, and the heavy swell had a very unpleasant effect upon our party, though it broke up finely over the rocks at the entrance of the river and over the foot of the fine promontory; the surf ran high, tossing up over the volume of fresh water which poured down to meet it, and we sped gallantly in on the crest of a wave, not however without getting a very sufficient wetting. This embouchure is really very pretty; the convents perched on the summits of the hills give much life to the scene, and the tablets carved on the cliff-face by ancient Assyrian and Egyptian conquerors (supposed to be those of Sennacherib and Rameses II.), add historical interest to it: the fine bold rocks and the winding ravine with the full, clear river, and the little Khan with its group of bright coloured figures, and probably a mule or a horse and rider fording the stream instead of going round by the steep, single-arched bridge in the middle of the picture,—unite into a very pretty scene. But the glen increases in sternness and grandeur as it winds back, a few olives and mulberries finding scanty standing-room on the edge of the river, while just beyond the bridge are the romantic-looking arches of an old aqueduct now filled up with tangled masses of luxuriant ferns, sweet hawthorns, the splendid leaves of the Arab sweet-potato, and trailing creepers hardly distinguishable from some long pendant stalactites, gemmed with bright drops from the water trickling through. The stream was bordered with flowers, among which flourished a numerous family of enormous green frogs, who were croakingly admonishing each other that some one would soon come to catch them for his dinner. I have no doubt they are very good, but we declined making our luncheon on them and preferred coffee and lemonade; after which we returned to our boat, and, tossing up on the top of a wave of river water, slid down the sloping surf on to the sea, and went slowly back to lovely Beyrout, which every body should linger one whole evening in the bay to see.

We would not put ourselves again at the mercy of the swell in that bay, so we took horse the next day and proceeded to the same place by land in the morning. The road passes by the fine old bridge over the Nahr* Beyrout, and the place where St. George of Cappadocia killed the "mighty worm" and rescued the Syrian princess; an indubitable fact, since it is witnessed by the stain of the blood which still remains on the spot where the holy warrior washed his hands, after finishing the dragon with a knife. Then we wound through some lanes and came out on the sands, taking a brisk canter along the edge of the waves till we reached the promontory of the Nahr el Kelb: the pleasant sands were strewn with the remains of vessels driven ashore during the past winter, two of which were English. Several ships are lost every year in this bay. After crossing the beautiful river, we rode a good hour further along meadows and gardens to the village of Zouk Mehayl, where one of the chief fabricants of pretty silk and gold stuffs had been requested to make us welcome. He took us to his house and spread piles of mattresses for us in the guest-room, his mother and pretty sister bringing snow-sherbet and coffee, and nargilehs for some of our party. We reposed for some time, for it was very hot, before we went up the village to see the fabriques: nearly every house or even hut in the place had its loom, sometimes many were at work together. The cloth is a woof of bright coloured silks on a warp of thick cotton threads, gold or silver thread being laid in with the colours of the patterns: it is shaped in pieces for cushions, slippers, bags and caps, which are very pretty and durable but somewhat costly, and they asked more for them here than in Beyrout. Some were also wearing silk scarfs and shawls—a poor imitation of the Damascus manufacture. Zouk is a thriving town, and very prettily situated on the side of the mountain sloping down into the lovely little Bay of Jouneh. We came home at a great pace in the cool evening air, thinking how charming a winter residence this bay would make for an invalid; it is a pity that this coast is not more sought by those who are obliged to seek a warmer climate than our own; there are many places on the coast which combine the advantages of the most delicious climate and magnificent scenery under a clear sky, bright sunshine, and sweet, but not relaxing air. Beyrout is said be somewhat damp in the winter, but then the winter seldom lasts six weeks and is not severe enough to render a fire necessary, though a brasier of hot coals in the evening may sometimes, but not often, be agreeable; and with a little notice and pre-arrangements, houses might be found at Latakia, Beyrout, and its neighbourhood, Saïda and Hhaïffa, all most charming places; and living is certainly less, with a tolerably honest dragoman, than that at Naples, Nice or Malta; they are easy of access by frequent steamers, and the necessary comforts required for invalids can be had at Beyrout or from Alexandria, while, with a good dragoman, you have as little trouble in housekeeping as in an hotel. Of course these native-built country houses do not look very grand; but our experience can testify that a very little trouble taken, with the help of a dozen nails and a few yards of coloured flannel or cotton, will make the room not only comfortable but pretty also. The coast of Syria is at least worth thinking of by invalids for whom the ascent of the Nile is too expensive an affair: while Cairo is very damp in the early part of the winter, and feverish; and few people like Alexandria; Corfu is said to be dull; and many persons are tired of the regular Italian watering-places, and are unwilling to encounter the enormous expense of a winter there. Of course, with the exception of one or two families at Beyrout, there could be no society, as the Consuls are the only European residents at each place; but to some persons this would be a minor objection.

* River.

There are innumerable charming expeditions to be made from Beyrout; and while waiting for our house to be ready, we determined to initiate ourselves into the mysteries of tent life in an excursion to Deir-el-Kamar*, the capital of the Druze country, which generally takes two long days' riding; but as we were new at mountain riding we determined to devote four to it. The starting day of any excursion in Syria is one that calls for extraordinary patience and good temper; even with these it is immensely wearying and provoking. We were ourselves dressed at 5 A.M., and our mules arrived soon after, but they were not finally loaded and despatched till near 11 A.M., and we followed at mid-day; we had eight mules, and a donkey to carry their master, and we took a cook, canteen, and three tents. This was our kit throughout Syria:—a large tent for ourselves with double carpets, beds, dinner table, and two folding arm-chairs, with another tent for our maid, and the kitchen tent; our personal luggage, which was packed in two tin travelling-baths in stout wicker coverings (a luxury with which I recommend every lady-traveller in this climate to provide herself), and a couple of portmanteaus, went on two mules, one of them surmounted by a little wooden cage or carriage, in which the Maltese dog, our inseparable companion and faithful little night-guard, was carried; he used to distinguish us at an almost incredible distance, and his bark of recognition, his voice of welcome in answer to our footsteps, was always the glad sound which announced that the tents were nigh and the dinner ready, at the end of a long weary day's ride; every one, even Mooslims, petted the pretty little thing wherever we went. His ancestors, of the noble Lion family of Malta, had some time ago settled at Smyrna, where this small scion of the house was given to me. He has long white hair, large black eyes, and a knowing little black nose.

* Alas, thirteen months after, the scene of horrible and sanguinary atrocities.

Our road lay through the Pine-forest, thence it turned off through many winding lanes hedged with prickly pear, pomegranates, and hawthorn still in blossom, towards the mountains; in the gardens a few palm-trees are growing, but they look very stunted, sickly, and small, and give but a melancholy souvenir of Egypt. Leaving the olive-groves about Hadith, the road crosses a narrow sandy plain and then begins to wind up the mountain. The beauty of the scenery compensates for all the désagréments of the path. But before we ascend further let me try and describe what is called a road in Syria, without understanding which no one can by any means fancy what travelling there really is like; how much it adds to the fatigue; how much it must necessarily occupy the attention, and still more how much time is consumed in its difficulties. The best of all the mountain roads are staircases of paved stones, made chiefly by the Emir Beschir; these are all very well in going up, but in coming down most horses give you a kind of jolting bang on each step, which makes one feel sea-sick in a long descent. I had a dear old horse afterwards who used to come down quite gently on the step, but it is at the best a disagreeable jogging process: very frequently these steps are broken or missing, and then one gets down as one can; more usually the path is the dry bed of a torrent, full of stones and big boulders, brought down and left by the rushing stream, loose and awkward to tread amongst: worse than these are long places like an old stone quarry, or as if the side wall, originally built of large blocks, had fallen down. Over these sharp edges, deep holes, and uncertain footing, the horse feels his way as cautiously as if they were burning hot, and in descending it is somewhat dangerous. Nothing, however, is so bad as the dreadful smooth rocks at an acute angle, with perhaps a horrid cleft at the bottom, down which the unfortunate animals slither in a way that is apt to excite a very unpleasant sensation in the region of the heart and throat,—in excuse for which it must be remembered that as all these paths, except the staircases, are made by mother-nature, they are of any conceivable slope, and of course the worst bits of path are always at the most perilous spot,—a winding turn at the edge of a ravine, or overhanging a yawning chasm; then no one likes to feel the horse under him gathering up his fore feet for a jump or a drop, which, overdone by an inch, will precipitate you, if not him also, to the bottom of the mountain. True, the horses are extraordinarily sure-footed and cautious, though they seldom seem to have a good point about them, and they climb like cats; but accidents do occur sometimes, and a lady's seat has a strong feeling of one-sidedness about it when both her feet are hanging over a precipice, and only one shoulder seems really over terra-firma. The Arab saddles save some fatigue in this continual ascent and descent, and where it is very steep indeed, and your horse feels as if he must topple back or fall on his nose, they give support and steadiness better than the English saddle. Most gentlemen bring their own saddles, but I believe those who do not, get on quite as well as those who do. We had English side-saddles sent out to us, and our bridles were of anything, bits of rope or leather, often adorned with fine tassels and amulets, fringe and shells, &c. &c., over the head and neck of favourite animals, and excessively pretty the harness often is when they are fresh and good. Well, we have wandered far from our present road, but this description is really necessary, and having been thus given once, it applies to nearly all the paths throughout Syria.

The road to Deir el Kamar, however bad, is charmingly beautiful. After resting a little at a fine fountain called 'Ain Bsāba, we wound round a richly-wooded gorge on a path about two feet wide, and through a pretty village called 'Ain Anoob, full of sweet geraniums, where we looked up to the great English silk-reeling factory of Shumlan, belonging to Mr. Scott, and down over all the road we had come from Beyrout; then turning up a breezy hillside, we found our tents pitched in an olive grove outside the village of Anâb, commanding splendid views of the plain of Beyrout spread out like a map, the miles of olive and pine-woods and gardens contrasting with the white town and the red sands, the blue sea, and the ever beautiful mountains. All the valleys on this road are richly wooded and luxuriant with flowers; every stream teems with oleanders; the pines perfume the air; and every height, if not covered with a village, is topped by a convent.

Our day had been a short one, but we were very much tired, and went to bed at once, after dining by lantern-light under an olive tree. The next morning, somewhat appalled by the difficulties, not to say dangers, of the road, I remarked to the dragoman that I hoped to-day's would be better: "Mademoiselle," he solemnly answered, "la route devient toujours pire;" and with this consolation in my mind we started. Our way led over a hill that was literally rose colour with wild flax; the old terrace walls were studded with cyclamen, and every here and there the wild hollyhocks shot up in spikes of fine lilac flowers, over a truly atrocious path, which soon opened on the Wady el

Kâdy (the Valley of the Judge), a magnificent valley running N.E. and S.W., with a fine dashing river at the bottom; but before we had sufficiently enjoyed it we were descending the most fearful winding track through a pine-forest, throughout which, much as I have climbed and descended since, it is still a marvel to me how any one of us stuck on our horses*; however we reached the bottom in safety, and crossed a picturesque old bridge over the foaming river, and began to ascend the other side, amidst ilex and thorn, juniper, myrtle and cypress, tangled over with wild vines: but we lost the track, and finally had to clamber up an almost impossible place, where one of our horses fell and threw his rider, but happily without hurting him. The summit gained at last, we looked over the sea on the right, with the bright red-sided mountain terraced with figs and olives, and noble cliffs of cold grey limestone; and on the left, down the fine valley of Deir el Kamar, Druze villages on every hilltop, the town itself standing out white and shining on a mountain spur, and at the head of the valley, the famous castle-palace of the Emir Beschir, Bteddeen. We were soon in the town, which struck us as handsome and lively; the houses all built of smoothly-hewn stone, frequently with arched and mullioned windows, each with its little balcony of flowers, among which we noticed several white lilies; we passed through some tolerable bazaars and a fine convent, from whence the town takes its name, there having been anciently a figure of the Virgin standing on the Moon, carved on a stone outside the convent wall *; it had a small dome surmounted by a cross, and seemed well built. There were also one or two minarets and a gaily-painted Serai, or Turkish Governor's house for business†: but we did not stay to see much, as we wanted to reach Bteddeen early. The descent, however, from the town was so terrific (we took the wrong road where no horses go, I believe), that we did not get to the bottom, and up the long, steep, zigzag staircase leading to the palace, till 2 P.M.

* The "Times" correspondent gave (September 21, 1860) a detailed account of all this road, in which we were amused to recognise each particularly "bad step" that had horrified us when, like him, we took this path on our first Syrian excursion.

Bteddeen has been often described, but yet another description still may perhaps be pardoned; it is a pleasure to me to linger over the memory of its many beauties, all the more as probably ours were nearly the last European eyes that beheld them. We entered by a gateway under a succession of dark arches leading into a spacious square, the right-hand side of which was built on arches, forming the stables of the Emir's stud, (usually of 500 horses it is said), over which was a terrace looking out on the glorious valley; this square had been the tilting or parade ground in the Emir's time: we crossed it into another square of the same size, in the midst of which stood a fountain in a bower of acacias in blossom, and at the opposite end the beautiful palace front itself, with an arcade to which a wooden staircase fantastically formed and gaily painted and gilt, was attached; the walls were panelled entirely over with medallions of various coloured marbles, and the doorways and windows adorned in the same way, the whole frontage being thus, with the floorings and balustrade of the terrace, a mass of marble mosaic in the most exquisite arabesques—in fact the patterns and execution of the Bteddeen mosaic are superior to, and more varied and elegant than the best things of the kind in Venice, not excepting even the flooring of St. Mark's. In the centre of the terrace, against the wall, a beautiful little fountain still played, but some of the bits of mosaic had dropped out here and there and were replaced by delicate sprays of light and tender maiden-hair fern, bending down to the crystal stream, which seemed to brighten up under the smiles of the green fronds—a mark of ruin certainly, but sacrilegious would have been the restorer's hand that should pluck out those graceful wreaths that hung there, hiding the decay of past splendour in their own sweet freshness. Off this terrace were several rooms, the ceilings, doors, and shutters of which, were most elaborately painted in bright patterns, the gilding sadly dimmed, but enough remaining to show what charming little bowers, fit for fairy princesses, they had once been. From this we passed into the inner apartments, and went through the bath-rooms: they were considerably finer than any other thing of the kind we saw in the East, excepting one or two of the principal houses in Damascus: they were entirely of mosaic in marble, everywhere, except under each fountain where porcelain tiles of a very fine make were used: there were plants—oranges, lemons, roses, &c. growing in every room except the hottest, and fountains trickling or playing everywhere; and the large siesta hall was divided down the middle by slender, clustered columns supporting a hundred vaultings. Many of these rooms opened into gardens of lemons and oranges that once were doubtless very charming, but they showed the want of care and the rude hand of the Turkish soldier, more than the palace itself.

* Deir, convent: kamar, moon.

† Afterwards the scene of the most atrocious part of the horrible massacres here.

The colonel of the ugly soldiers quartered there was gone to Damascus, but after we had reposed some time on the terrace, a lieutenant, dressed in a complete suit of primrose silk, brought us a pressing invitation from his chief's wife to enter the harem; she sent the eldest son of the colonel, a boy of about ten years old, and an old black slave to conduct us there. We were shown first into a hall, full of marble columns, with a square gallery at each end, ornamented with marble and gilding, through which we entered the harem court, where a large fountain was playing in the hot sun; in this court a number of immensely fat women and slaves, each dressed in a single loose garment of coloured muslin, were romping violently, throwing water at each other and jumping in and out of the fountain, upon seeing which, the boy who had come with us tore off all his clothes save a small pair of drawers and jumped in with them. Not any of the women were pretty; they took very little notice of us, and only left off their romps now and then to come and stare at us for a minute. We were taken into a small richly divanèd room where the favourite wife of the colonel was nursing a fat baby of which she was very proud, as it was a son. She was young and pretty, but her features were more like those of a boy than of a young woman, and her dress of yellow Manchester cotton was very ugly; her hair was cropped in a straight line on the forehead as Moslems generally wear it, and hung down behind in one long plait; afterwards she put on a blue velvet jacket embroidered with gold and a dirty tarboosh. Two Christian women who were paying a visit like ourselves, and who were both very pretty, looked beautifully neat and clean beside the Moslems. The wife asked innumerable questions, all of which we answered to the best of our Arabic powers, when we understood them, and then she showed us the other rooms, of which the ceilings were equally beautifully painted; they all had plenty of mattresses spread on the floor, but the wife's room had an iron bedstead with mosquito curtains round it. We saw little to admire; they wore no jewels, and the only pretty thing was a hand-mirror, in a finely worked filagree silver frame, which we wanted to buy, but she would not part with it.

We were glad to have been invited into the hareem, if only to see the view from the windows, so romantically beautiful in the long narrow ravine up which the Castle windows look, due west, with the sea at the end; hill after hill bordering the valley on each side, the nearest one crowned with another small palace built for the Emir's mother, and the pretty white town further on at the other side; both sides richly clothed with mulberry terraces and fruit gardens, while from the stream at the bottom the steep zigzags up to the Palace are so well seen, that a knight of yore might have mounted the whole way without once losing sight of his lady's eyes shining on him from her latticed bower, the rest of the fortress proudly and sternly guarding the narrow pass below the lofty cliffs; a place, indeed, for dreams of chivalry and fair ladies; but from which, certes, nothing can awaken one more completely than the sight of the rows of Turkish soldiers, round, fat, and short, in tight blue trousers, little close jackets, and small red fezzes over their ugly heads,—and nothing indeed be less romantic, than the stout, coarse females of the hareem. These soldiers blew a fine flourish of trumpets and stared at us immensely when we left the fortress; they were probably the same garrison who butchered the unfortunate Christians in the following summer (June 19, 1860), and were ill-looking enough for anything; too horrible it is to think of the beautiful place, with the gnawed and mangled remains of human bodies scattered through its courts, and the snowy marbles of those delicately ornamented floors "pallid with horror, while the red darkened with blood."* The Turkish soldiers had done much to spoil its beauty, but the plundering Christian peasants are doing much more, and if we regretted then that we could not transport the whole place bodily to England, one is more than ever sorry now that ruin and desolation and a horrible memory has laid its heavy hand upon the once lovely and smiling spot.

The children of the town regularly mobbed us after dinner, bringing bouquets of flowers as we lay upon the sward outside our tents, enjoying the beautiful view, the twinkling light, the large shining stars, and the multitudes of fire-flies that danced round us. Now and then a faint sound of singing rose from the valley, or a bird trilled a little evening strain; but the boys would chatter; for the American mission schools have done much work here, and not a few could speak both French and English, which they were too glad to exercise upon the strangers. One of them had impudence enough to beg we would lend him fifty piasters, which he assured us he would certainly repay if ever we came back to Syria!

Every house in the little town had its flower garden of roses, lilies, geraniums, &c.; among them we noticed a splendid double sweet-scented moss-rose of a fine deep lemon colour, which would make glad the heart of an English gardener. The inhabitants were nearly all Christians — chiefly Maronites, with a few Greeks under the Mutsellim; but the valley is full of Druze villages, as it is close to their chief stronghold Mukhtārah, and their Kūlwehs are seen everywhere, generally perched on some lofty or nearly inaccessible crag. The Kūlweh is their place of worship, there they meet every Thursday evening, and feast after service upon raisins, figs, &c.; but the meetings are conducted with such entire secrecy that little is known about them, and any one hardy enough to venture too near has invariably been put to death; but from what is known they seem to be more political than devotional assemblies, only the Akhals (or initiated) are admitted, and the affairs of the community discussed; a wonderful system of rapid and thorough communication is kept up, and the most perfect organisation and discipline reigns among them,—this is one of the things in which they are so far superior to their Maronite neighbours. They buy and sell much in the town, and are far neater and cleaner in appearance than the Christians. The Bazaars were lively and the people crowded round us with antiques, coins, &c., to sell, and sweet snow-water, which they pressed upon us and for which they seemed unwilling to be paid. We got a fine antique bronze lamp, and a bronze ornament of two rudely sculptured but very lively bulls, for a few piasters; they closely resemble some of the Phœnician bronzes in the fine collection at Turin.

* Ruskin.

The sun was too hot for us to linger, so we started off at 9 A.M. over the hill-top; there the fresh sea-breeze met us, as we looked down on the winding Da'mour, the ancient Tamyras, and retraced our steps through the Wady el Kādy, till we reached our tents placed beside the fountain of 'Ain Bsaba among thickets of honeysuckle and wild geraniums; as the sun sunk over the sea I went up and bathed in the bright spring, which is shaded over by noble trees. Late in the evening a terrible khamseen set in, and we had a wild night, the tents every now and then coming down over our heads as we lay panting and suffocating on our beds; they had been badly pitched on soft ground, where the pins would not hold, and two of them had been unwittingly placed on an ant-march, so that the unfortunate occupiers were swarmed over the whole night through, by countless multitudes of the black beasties. The khamseen brought up thousands of sand-flies who operated vigorously upon our faces, for we had no musquito curtains then, and we became so ill with the unwholesome air, that we got up at three o'clock to dress, in hopes of getting off by daylight,—but, pour comble de malheur, I was incautiously washing upon the grass, when a big black scorpion, astounded at the apparition, walked up to one of my feet and stung me, and I fell into such pain for some hours that dressing or moving was out of the question. We sent off to Beyrout for ammonia, but by the time it came I was better. The khamseen began to abate, and we reached the hôtel at mid-day, very ready for breakfast and thankful it was no worse, for the black scorpions are the least venomous of the race. The yellow ones are terrible biters, and cause fearful agony and swelling, but their bite is seldom fatal.

We found a large party of our Nile companions arrived at the hotel in readiness for the French home steamer; it was pleasant to meet with even such slight acquaintances in this distant land,—but the change effected in them all since we had met in Egypt was more or less appalling. The nose of each one had been skinned once or twice or thrice; several were in the most brilliant process of excoriation, and every face below the forehead was painted in turkey-cockian hues! It was perfectly absurd to look round the table at the indescribable varieties of RED that graced the board.

Two days after this we rode up to Beit Miry and took possession of our house, which we found perfectly charming and comfortable in every respect; the balconies were filled with carnations, the terraces bordered with hollyhocks and belle-de-nuit, and everything looked smiling; while just as we set foot on the threshold a volley of cannon sounded from the town barracks and from every ship in the bay! resounding back in peals of thunder from the mountains all around us. We were a little astonished, and the villagers believed it was to welcome the English ladies,—but in reality it was a royal salute on the landing of the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia.

CHAP. IX.

OUR MOUNTAIN HOME.

THE village of Beit Miry runs along the top of a mountain ridge, something more than 2000 feet above the sea, which curves round in the form of a semicircle: the peasants' houses slope down on either side of the ridge, the Druzes mostly occupying the west, and the Christians the east end. Our house was planted on the end of the western horn, while the Christian Emir's house and the Maronite chapel faced us at the end of the eastern horn, just above a beautiful little pine-forest,—the whole of the circle between being filled up with curving mulberry terraces and a few of the best houses. Beyrout is so charming till the end of June, that the season of Beit Miry had not then commenced, but by July eight or nine European families had taken refuge from the heat of the town and arranged themselves somehow in three peasant houses; they were miserable gîtes in themselves, only one other in the place besides our own house being really a good one, and that was not half as pretty as ours; but from standing at the western extremity of the village it commanded the view in the northern valley as well as the southern view of Beyrout, and in this respect was certainly one of the finest spots in the whole of the Lebanon, indescribably beautiful. Beyond this another smaller semicircle curved out from the ridge towards the south; this was covered with a forest of pines, planes, and some magnificent oaks, while, like a fortress crowning the summit, the large Convent of Deir-el-Khüllah, proudly surveyed the glorious country, itself a landmark for many miles.

Immediately above our house, on the top of the crag, stood a collection of Druze houses; about half an hour's steep descent below us was the palace of the Maronite Bishop, called Madräss. When the Europeans had come up, we used to think what a curious variety of creeds had met in that one small village—Druzes, Maronites, Roman Catholics “united” and ununited, Greeks, Lutherans, English Protestants, and a few Moslems. Perhaps the constant communication of the villagers with Beyrout, and the annual stay of so many Europeans among them has done a good deal to improve the inhabitants of Beit Miry, but we certainly found them an honest (honesty, bien entendu, à l'Arabe), simple-minded, and industrious set; the Druzes are more industrious, the men much cleaner, and immensely finer-looking than the Christians, but the Druze women, on the contrary, look filthy and frightful beside the mountain Maronite women, many of whom in Beit Miry were really very pretty, and were always gaily, and generally cleanly dressed. A bright coloured cotton gown, with usually a thick red woollen shawl wound round the hips, white muslin appearing at the neck, (though the gown is always left wide open to the waist in front,) a white apron sometimes, and invariably a white muslin veil, often very prettily embroidered in colours,—such is the costume of the Maronite woman, to which must be added string after string of gold and silver coins wound round the throat, falling over and below the bosom, according to the wealth of the owner, and among them perhaps two or three little triangular silver boxes containing charms, scraps of the Koran written on parchment. Her headdress is a red tarboosh edged with coins, a piece of bright coloured crape or gauze tied round it, and then the Christian head ornament, viz. from 100 to 200 strings of black silk cord about two feet long into which are woven at intervals little bits of gold shaped thus; each string ending in a solid tassel or knob of gold or silver; I have seen as many as 3000 bits of gold on one headdress, but usually they carry from 1000 to 2000. These strings, which are all joined into one mass at the top, and are called the "saffah," are fastened to the back of the tarboosh, the long silk tassel of which hangs over them; an ornament of filagree gold called the koors, is generally worn at the top of the tassel also; while from the front of the head, on one side only, a very pretty festoon ornament of eight or ten chains of gold or strings of pearls is added, each one strung with larger bits of gold than those on the saffah; a brooch of diamonds, &c., or a bouquet of natural flowers, is stuck in on the other side. This headdress is extremely pretty and graceful.

In this land of constant petty warfare and blood-feuds, it is no wonder that the wealth of every family should be reduced to a portable form; nor is it any wonder either that a husband should heap ornaments on his wife's person year after year to the utmost of his power, since, at his death, she retains no other possession, all the remainder of his property being divided among his children. It is thought unseemly for a man to propose marriage until he has funds sufficient to bestow on his bride a massive gold necklace of a peculiar pattern—de rigueur throughout Syria — and which costs at least 24*l*. In times of distress one of the coins, or if these are gone, a piece of the necklace is cut off and sold, but to be replaced as soon as possible.

The Druze women wear a long dark blue cotton chemise like the Egyptian women, and a square of the same stuff which is drawn over the head and face, and over the tantour, if one is worn. The Christian women are generally very fair though with dark eyes; the Druze women are dark, skinny, and ugly, and grow old much earlier than their Christian neighbours, because they do more hard work, and are more exposed to the weather with fewer clothes to cover them.

Our housekeeping was soon arranged; we had eggs, milk, and fowls from the village, and meat, vegetables, and groceries from the town for the first month; after this, we had abundance of meat and fruit, &c. from the village. Three or four Druzes went down every morning early to Beyrout with their mules, and brought back their commissions duly performed in the afternoon. We seldom had occasion to find fault with them, but we had a great grievance in having every little package or parcel turned over and searched by the douane at the gate of Beyrout, even if our dragoman or cook accompanied them; and, like Frank in the story, who would look, then touch, then smell, and finally succumbed under the temptation of tasting, large pieces of our sugar, coffee, and fruit were mulcted by the soldiers, and very provoking it was to have one's peaches and figs arrive looking like moulds for their curious and presumptuous fingers. We applied to Mr. Moore, the Consul, to have a ticket of exemption given to us as consumers, not dealers, but nothing was ever done about it, and the food was too simple and good to admit of our hoping it might disagree with the soldiers.

It is not easy to say how happy we were in our mountain home; we were perfectly indifferent to society, as we had plenty of books (thanks to our friends), and many other occupations besides reading; our maid was still sewing hard to replace the burnt clothes; and, in truth, we found very close attention to study remarkably difficult with so beautiful a prospect ever enchanting and fascinating our eyes: hours and hours that I intended to spend in reading found me looking and looking at the view, with my book in my hand,—and yet we never could decide all the months we stayed there whether the landscape was most beautiful by morning or by evening. In every light and under every circumstance I longed to sketch its many beauties, but we had not been able to replace our paint boxes since the fire, and it was not till ten days before we left it, probably for ever, that paper, pencils, or colours arrived from England. Our days passed in monotonous pleasantness, every little variety seeming only a fresh pleasure. We were up with the first streak of dawn, between four and five A.M., and if Paradise is to be found in this world, it must be in the feel of the air early in the morning on those mountains. How the birds sang—how the fresh air came up, stirring with fragrant perfumes all round one—how the night clouds floated softly away—how the sunlight strode with majestic steps down the mountain side and over the plain—how the sea deepened and brightened from red to blue—how the sun caught the white line of foam on the rocky shore, and tipped house after house and village after village with gold! Truly this was what Hood calls:

“that breath in the air
A perfume and freshness strange and rare,
A warmth in the light and a bliss everywhere,
All sweets below, and all sunshine above.”

Then we sat in the balconies among the flowers, or under our shady arcade, watching the villagers making very brief toilettes as they rose from their beds on the housetops (the children, like dogs, seemed only to shake themselves for their toilettes, while the family washing was invariably deferred till after sunset, when one bowl of water would be brought up for a couple of women or half a dozen children),—or we watched the goats going by to fresh pastures,—or the cows, of which there were not many, and the sheep on their way to be fed in the mulberry-terraces on freshly gathered leaves,—or strings of mules departing to some distant place,—or the crowds of women going down in the cool early shade to the fountain to fetch up the water for the day, before the sun came on the spring; while we sat eating basketfuls of figs gathered before the dew was dry on their yellow skins, or of fresh, cool, golden prickly-pears. About eight o'clock a row of little round clouds, like tufts of cotton wool, rose up in a white line along the horizon of the sea, and the heat soon after became too great to bear out-of-doors,—but the little clouds rose and rose and spread, whitening broadly on the sky, and by 9.30 or '45, as punctual as a watch, up came the delicious breeze from their bosoms, and seemed to whisper, “Never mind the sun, I'm here, and I'll keep you cool;” and so it did; every day unfailingly it came, and every day it died away between 4 and 5 p.m., when the sun was going down, and the mountains beginning to cast long shadows on the plain; then we used to go out and climb a new height, or dive down into a new glen or ravine each day; every day we found a fresh path, or no path, to take, but some fresh object to interest or some fresh beauty to admire, so enticing that we never came home till after the sun had sunk behind the resplendent sea, and the purple night clouds had come up, and the villagers were rolling themselves up in thick blankets on the housetops; then sometimes the moon would shine with such loveliness, shedding floods of silver over mountain, sea, and plain, that we could not but pace our terraces till quite late, too full of admiration for sleep,—even when sleeping nature seemed near one; for as glass panes were unknown articles in Beit Miry, our windows had only iron bars to keep out animals, and wooden shutters in case of a storm; these, however, we never shut, and the fresh air of heaven blew over us asleep, without a chance at this height of bringing fever or cold, or any other ill, so delicious was the climate by day and by night, never too hot and never too cold.

Even our little village had its legend of love and death. There was a small house, consisting chiefly of a large verandah, half hidden among the mulberries between us and the Pine-forest, which was occupied some few years ago by a half European and half Arab family; the great beauty of the daughter had attracted many suitors for her hand, one of whom was most assiduous in his attentions; these were at first accepted, but after some time the affections of the fair one were bestowed on a more fortunate object, and partly in order to escape the unwelcome assiduities of the first lover, the family came up to the mountains for the summer. The inconsolable deserted one could not, however, resist the temptation of following his beloved mistress, hoping at least to gladden his eyes with the sight of her; tying his horse in the wood below, he stole through the trees near the house, and beheld her standing in the verandah with his hated rival; the bright moonlight shone down on both, and the expression of her face revealed to him how hopeless were his own prospects with regard to her. In a transport of jealousy he drew a pistol from his pocket and levelled it at his rival; but, alas! the mad passions of his soul had unhappily been beating in his hand, and the ball pierced the heart of the unfortunate girl, who fell, bathed in blood, into the arms of her more favoured, but not less unhappy lover! Maddened with horror and despair at the sight, the miserable young man discharged another pistol at himself, and in another second lay dead at only a few yards' distance from his murdered mistress!

We had rigged a flagstaff soon after our arrival, and there we hoisted a grand red jack above the house. Of course we had no kind of right to do so (as only Consuls are granted the privilege in Turkey), but we had carried our flag in Egypt, and intended to pitch it before our tents in travelling, and we had an idea that it might be of use to us in the mountains. Time proved the idea a good one, and we had reason to thank the kind friend who had provided us with the means of carrying it out. It led to an amusing consequence, for we found afterwards that every individual peasant who came down from the mountains, and all strangers from other villages, invariably stopped and asked who the great person could be whose house was ornamented with such brilliant colours: and that our dragoman and Arab cook, who were both mountaineers, and, consequently, tremendous gossips, for their own aggrandisement as well as ours, enlarged greatly upon how these English princesses had come all the way alone over the wide sea and through kingdom after kingdom to let their greatness sojourn for a while in the highly honoured village; the which history was received with innumerable "Mash•ällahs," and usually produced an amazing number of compliments.

The first Sunday after we arrived there, the drago-man announced that the Maronite priest of the village wished to pay us a visit, and after the morning service he and a companion priest, or curate, arrived. They were dressed in long black robes of serge with a scarf of the same wound round the waist, and the elder wore the regular mountain priest's head-dress, a large globe of black serge: he had a fine open intelligent face and a long white beard; the other looked commoner, and wore only a red tarboosh with a black scarf tied round it. They congratulated us on our safe arrival in their village after the innumerable perils of which they had heard travellers tell, and invoked all manner of blessings on us while we sojourned near them. The old Priest was pleasantly communicative as far as his limited subjects of interest and few words of Italian would admit: he told us that every Priest must be seven years in the college at Artourah before he is ordained, and that in the act of ordination the Bishop places one hand upon the candidate's forehead in blessing, while holding the chalice over his head with the other: they are supported by the voluntary contributions of their flock, but if this is not sufficient the Bishop provides them with a small allowance. Each Priest has a little garden which he cultivates for himself, but he is not permitted to labour elsewhere for gain; but we heard of many instances where the Priest helped a sick or unfortunate parishoner in his labour, and they seemed to be generally much beloved and respected in all the villages: everywhere we were told of their being diligent visitors of the sick. They marry generally the daughters of a Sheikh or Emir, some one a little above the common peasantry; marriage being one of the privileges which Rome was obliged to concede to the Maronite Church, and the peasantry are very particular in having married Priests for the confessors of their wives and daughters. We had not many subjects of conversation, but an "Illustrated London News" and some portrait photographs seemed to interest them very much, and they asked a great many questions. The Convent bell sounded mid-day during their visit, and both Priests stopped even in the midst of a sentence, and bowing the head said a short prayer, which they told us they repeated at every third hour in the day.

Some of the friends we had known in Egypt, who came up to see us before they embarked at Beyrout on their homeward voyage, and many of the richer Arabs in the village, came begging to see the English ladies, and were enormously pleased to examine us and our clothes, and our books and pictures, &c. &c., and they really seemed so much delighted that we had not the heart to send them away, however much they bored us; the woodcuts in a copy of Lane's "Modern Egyptians," representing the costumes of their Arab brethren, were viewed with clasped hands and many "Mash-āllahs!" but they said if we had such good pictures why did we come so far and take so much trouble to see them? After my paint-box arrived I used to get repeated messages entreating me to take their portraits for them; one very pretty woman, very rich in gold ornaments, came up early in the morning and sat till the afternoon, imploring to have her picture done, until I was really forced to do something like it, with which she was quite enchanted, the colours being very bright and the bad drawing quite immaterial to her. That woman became a perfect torment to us afterwards, for having happened to see a pair of stays lying on the table she became so mad to have them, that day after day she returned to the house with new and pressing entreaties, offering me at last coin after coin from her head-dress if I would only let her have the much coveted articles to make her figure as enchanting as a European lady's! We generally found them very quick and intelligent in taking in new ideas, several of the girls learning to play "solitaire" after once seeing our maid do it, and more than one succeeded in accomplishing the triumphant one-remaining ball, much to their own delight and our surprise. Perhaps our favourite walk of all was along the back of the village, and through the cool, delightful shade of the wood, up to the Convent of Deir el Khullah. There was a little chapel half way along the path, shaded by a group of lofty evergreen oaks, under whose sombre shade we rested many an early morning and sunset evening; after passing which the path wound up the hill, with the loveliest views of Beit Miry and the coast, through the wood and over the roughest of paths; for all this wood has grown over the ruins of an ancient town, the smoothly hewn stones of which would appear to have belonged to well-built houses. Then came the great square of the Convent, where some civil black-robed monks bade us welcome, and conducted us to the corridor. Here we loved to sit, for the view, framed in the mullioned double-arched window, is as beautiful as the heart of man could desire: the deep, richly wooded valleys at each side, the cheerful villages, the green uplands, the blue and purple ranges of distant hills, the wide expanse of sea, and Sunnîn, rosy and snowy, rising up, a giant wall, beyond all. Many an evening we lingered here, sketching or chatting with the monks, and wondering if any earthly view could be much more beautiful.

This Convent is built over the ruins of a very large Temple, of which some huge columns and stones are still standing; a great many Greek and Latin inscriptions have been fixed in the modern walls (most of them upside down), all mentioning the god of sports, or Bal-markos, the god to whom the Temple was probably dedicated. Doubtless the Greeks, in building the Temple, adopted to themselves the god to whom this "high-place" was originally dedicated by the Phœnicians, whose chief god, Baal, was invoked under various names and emblems added to his supreme name (as Baal-pheor, Baal-Berith), instead of translating or changing the divine name into their own Apollo or Jupiter: it is exactly the kind of spot which the ancient idolaters would have chosen for making a "grove," and a "high-place," whereon to perform their mysterious rites.

Close above our house there was a threshing-floor,—a little circular bit of smooth ground in the midst of a wild conglomeration of rocks; and often in the earliest sunbeams we used to wander up there to watch the bullocks dragging the board round and round over the ears of corn, on which sometimes the three pretty little children of the Emir would sit, helping to press down the rollers on the straw, the under side of the board being covered with sharp stones fastened on securely. In some parts of Syria they use knives or short scythes which chop the straw while they press out the corn; and, on a windy morning, they would all be busy flinging up handfuls of it into the air, that the wind might blow away the chaff ere the corn fell back upon the threshing-floor.

Beyond this a rough path led through a deep, romantic, wooded glen, where, bending low under prickly oaks, terebinth, and hedges of juniper and clematis, we used to come out upon a luxuriant vineyard, truly "a very fruitful hill," and sit on the edges of an ancient winepress of hewn stones, which had probably been there since the days when the Prophet Isaiah sang songs of the spiritual vineyard in the deaf ear of the Jews. There were three or four of the receptacles for the grapes built up of stones, and hollows for the juice to run out of them into a lower place, hewn out of the rock; all were now tangled over with unpruned vines, honeysuckle, and clematis, making a bower of shade for the workman when gathering the rich juice, and the mountain torrent dashing past wherein to cleanse the vessels. There were several of these winepresses on the hills close to us: the upper one had legends attached to it, and stories of *jinn*s and spirits and murders besides, and close to it ran the aqueduct which brings water down from Sunnîn, and, descending into the valley, used to carry a stream into Berytus, it is said. It is a pity it is not still kept in order, for water in Beyrout is very bad and very dear, and the aqueduct works to this day at Beit Miry, where we used to see a stream of pure water trickling through the interstices of the displaced stones.

One Sunday afternoon we descended the hill till we reached Madrass, the Bishop's Palace, to whom, on a hint from one of his attendant priests, we announced our intention of paying a visit; he sent word that he should be delighted, &c. &c., and we walked through his pleasant gardens and into the well-built, commodious house, part of which is a residence for priests. It was a plain but well finished building, with a good open staircase, on the balustrades of which crowds of snow-white doves were perched. The Bishop received us at the door of his apartment, — a good room with a pink and white bed at one side, handsome carpets, and a large writing-table piled over with innumerable papers and letters and a few books. He was a very fine, noble-looking man, with bright intelligent eyes, an intellectual countenance, and a venerable white beard; he seemed in the prime of life, and perfectly conversant with the affairs of the day in Europe. He asked many pertinent questions about England, but considered her evidently a half heathen land a very long way off, whose only importance lay in her influence on the great European powers; but he really knew more of the details of the war then going on between France and Austria than we did, and had fresher intelligence: in fact, it was very remarkable, as we often had occasion to observe, how closely the Syrians watched the events passing in Europe, seemingly beyond their personal interest. Here, and further up in the mountains, it was the same thing: they knew as much, and more than we could tell them, and the Druzes seemed absolutely to have the news of each engagement in the campaign, before the Europeans themselves had had notice of the affairs of the very countries they represented!

The Bishop was very busy, but he talked a great deal, and begged us to come back soon; he asked many questions about English ordinations, and how and whence we got bishops, &c. &c., and seemed very much interested when we told him of our great cathedrals, and his eyes brightened up as he said he wished he might go to England to see them. We promised to pay him another visit and to show him some "Illustrated News" pictures; but the very day we had appointed to go there, was, alas! the day of our forced departure from Beit Miry, and we never saw him again.

Notwithstanding all the beauties and delights of our quiet mountain home, we became impatient to make some excursions from it, before the summer had become quite too hot for travelling among the higher mountains; especially we determined that we must scale that snowy Jebel Sunnîn, whose rosy crest was ever before our eyes in every walk. So we sent down to Beyrout for horses and mules, packed up our tents, &c., and set forth very early on the morning of the 6th of June, leaving the little dog to keep house at home with one of the men-servants, as we knew it would be too cold on the mountains for him.

The guide-books and travellers' accounts of the district we visited are so insufficient that we were obliged to trust entirely to the guidance of our dragoman, to whom every path was familiar; and we were not disappointed in the route he selected. Of all the wanderings we made, from north to south of Syria, no other seven days showed us such a vast variety of ever-changing panoramas of glorious and magnificent scenery as these did. The Cedars of Lebanon have a grave, majestic beauty about them which nothing else can equal,—the wild and wooded sides of the Litaany,—the soft, sad tenderness of the Lake of Tiberias,—and the flowery forests of Mount Carmel, each have their own peculiar loveliness; but the Kesrouân combines every variety of scenery in its stern grandeur and gentle grace, its rich colouring and wild contrasts, to say nothing of the exhilarating mountain air, cool, refreshing, and so fragrant with perfumed sweetness, that Israel, in the perfection of his blessedness, might well be said to "smell like Lebanon."

The blue morning mist was still veiling the valley with its beautiful bright haze when we skirted the valley of El Metn, passing through the pretty village of Brumâna (where the Emir has a nice-looking house actually built with a sloping roof and glass), and turned up over a sea-blown mountain brow into a pine forest, where the rocks looked as if they had been burned like those of Nubia, and the path was, as we always observed it was under pine trees, abominable. On the left hand the Convent of Mar Ishayr, the highest of all the convents seen from the mouth of the Nahr el Kelb, stood perched on an insulated peak—a fine situation, but they have no water, and are obliged to carry every drop they use up the toilsome ascent. Then winding round two sides of a deep valley we reached the large village or town of Bukfeyia, where we alighted to see the French filature or silk-reeling fabrique: nearly all the workers were boys, each with his bundle of cocoons hopping about in a pan of boiling water before him; after brushing off the coarse outer silk, the ends of the fine silk from three cocoons were instantly attached to a spool on the edge of the table, whence it passed to the huge wheel that wound off the large skeins. The silk is sorted into yellow and white—the productions of a different variety of worm—and looked exquisitely fine and glossy: it is not, however, considered quite equal to the silk of Broussa. The refuse silk is used for tassels or other coarse articles. The boys were mostly ugly enough—one was precisely a Thibetan Mongol with sloping eyes and eyebrows, high cheek-bones, and a melancholy mouth with thick lips. Bukfeyia boasts a fine palace, where the late Emir Hyder resided, and where the Emir, who is governor of the whole Lebanon, ought to reside; but it was then empty: the reigning prince, being very unpopular among the Bukfeyians, was living at Beyrout. Bukfeyia is full of pretty gardens, and commands an extensive view overlooking several valleys and picturesque villages: the wood about it is more than usually varied, the pine and oak being mingled with poplar, willow, plane, ilex, arbutus, caroob, &c. &c.

At mid-day we reached the foot of the mountain cliff where the large, rich Maronite Convent of Mar-esh-Schouw-yair stands proudly on the promontory looking up through beautiful valleys to Jebel Sunnîn. We mounted the path, hoping to make a comfortable rest; but the Superior was absent. Most of the monks had gone to a funeral, and the younger brothers seemed so dreadfully frightened at the idea of admitting three women into their salon or their chapel, that we compounded with them for permission to spread our carpets in the cloisters. They managed to bring the alarming daughters of Eve some cushions (upon which we immediately fell asleep), and when we left them they exploded into fits of laughter on seeing us jump up sideways on our saddles, and we heard them still laughing and laughing as we descended the winding path. Then came a long, narrow, beautiful ravine, on the opposite side of which, among thick mulberry terraces, we looked down upon the Greek Convent of Mar Hanna* Schouw-yair, a very large building where the first Arabic printing-press ever set up in the Lebanon was made. This good work and the fine cultivation of the mountains all round these Convents speak much in favour of the monks; nor did we ever hear a single word said against any one of the numerous Convents of the Lebanon — nothing but respect and gratitude; and perhaps, until the government of the country is in some degree improved and the peasantry protected, and civilisation and education are in some degree spread amongst them, these fraternities of single men are the best methods of accomplishing any kind of cultivation in the unhappy and wasted land.

* St. John.

From first to last, throughout Syria and Palestine, the one great feeling ever present to one's mind, as one's eyes journey on, mile by mile, is this deplorable waste of land: — when one sees what the rude industry of the ignorant and poverty-stricken peasant can accomplish, — that smiling crops, delicious pastures, luxuriant fruit gardens, and rich woods, result from the meagre, clumsy work done by the mountaineer, unassisted by modern implements or knowledge, — one cannot but sigh to remember our half exhausted homelands, and think how small the capital, how slight the head-work, and how short the time, that would turn the plains and mountains of Syria again into “a land flowing with milk and honey,” and repay the workman, not tenfold, but a hundredfold. At present a little corn, mulberries and olives, figs and vines, are repeated generation after generation in the same terraces; but the amount of work necessary to convert thousands of miles of mountain and valley into fertile ground would be but small, and there are few crops to be found anywhere that could not be cultivated successfully either on the uplands or lowlands: while the climate is incontestably remarkable for salubrity, and a life in the hill country would be by no means too hot for even a Scotch Highlander. Cotton would be admirably produced in the plains; and if the enterprise was commenced on a sufficiently large and imposing scale, a very little firmness, resolution, and judicious conduct would undoubtedly insure success. It is true that the Turks do not particularly like or encourage European settlers, but the Christian Arabs are delighted to welcome those who they know will improve their condition,—will be their guardians and protectors,—and beside whom they could in some degree range themselves, against the rapacious and dishonest cruelties of the government, and of their own lawless sects and tribes.

A most atrocious zigzag ascent led over the crown of the ravine, and we found ourselves suddenly on a small meadow, where our tents were pitched beneath a group of truly magnificent oaks, commanding a view on all sides that was really sublime; Kunisyeh, Nukh el Jurd, and Sunnîn stood with numberless other heights majestically round us,—the feet of the two former clad in thick woods which we were told abounded in wild boars. This place is called El-Merooj.

We went to bed very much tired,—to be awakened from dreams of fine scenery and sunshine by torrents of rain,—a very unusual circumstance at this season. Long before morning our tent, which was not a double one, had begun to leak; our clothes had got soaked through in the night, and we had no alternative but to remain in bed, as the only dry place, and to take our breakfasts in waterproof cloaks under umbrellas. Alas! the rain continued with unabated violence, and towards the middle of the day we unanimously agreed, that we were not a little uncomfortable. However, at last a bright thought occurred to Habeeb; at a little distance there was a half finished stone hut, built to shelter mules, &c. &c., with a roughly-made oven in one corner; into this hut our three beds, which had been kept pretty dry, were carried, and we followed them, conveyed on the back of a mule. The hut was unplastered and windowless, but dry; it seemed uncommonly like a dungeon, and I was in mortal fear of snakes, &c., but we lit a charcoal fire in the oven, and were sleeping comfortably enough, when—we were awakened by low, hoarse sounds, perfectly inexplicable, and very alarming. We were at some distance from the tents and men-servants, and were beginning to feel a little odd, when the strange noises waxed louder and louder, shriller and shriller, and at last burst forth into the unmistakable crows and cacklings of a lot of cocks and hens that had been placed by some peasant in the oven, and were becoming immensely astonished at the heat of the fire!

The rain, which is very uncommon indeed in June, continued to fall all night, but in the morning the sky cleared, and we mounted about eleven, and pushed on up steep paths, among loose rocks and crags of blue limestone of the most fantastic shapes, round the head of a valley tributary to the Nahr el Kelb, coming suddenly upon thickets of glorious and lovely rhododendrons growing in wild luxuriance among the rocks, with a beauty that made one forget cold and rain and everything disagreeable. Beds of purple lupines too were dotted all along the path as we turned up a short pass into the great valley of the Nahr el Kelb itself,—a most peculiar and magnificent valley,—the mountain sides of all manner of rich, bright colours, with trees and meadows of fine corn up to the very summits; while half way down commenced, on both sides, vertical walls of blue limestone, straight and smooth down to the very bottom: it looks as if the mountains had turned bottom upwards by mistake. This part of the valley can scarcely be crossed anywhere, so unbroken are these rocky walls. We passed along opposite the pretty, scattered village of Biskinta, half hidden in woods and fruit gardens, and then, having climbed up a very steep conical hill, we stopped at a little hut, placed in a wild, mournful solitude in the midst of a barren waste, where some shepherds were eating their dinner. Here we took shelter from a shower, and had but just rejoined the road when the rain increased tenfold and a thick blinding fog came up the valley, only breaking here and there enough to give us glimpses of perpendicular depths below, from so dizzy a height and so narrow a goat-track, that perhaps it was as well we could see so little of the perilous way. We were now passing over the southern shoulder of Sunnîn, right up among the snow, when Habeeb suddenly stopped, and jumping down exclaimed that here, at last, was a piece of sandy ground upon which we could pitch our tents, the ground everywhere else being as soakingly wet and dripping as we were ourselves. He spread a mat for us, and we alighted, huddling under one umbrella until the pitching of the tent was with much difficulty accomplished, a large fire lit, and our beds made, in which we immediately took refuge, and where we dined. We needed the fire, for the wind coming off the snow was horribly cold: we were now at least 7000 feet above the sea.

The morning proved fine, and we rode on enjoying the sunshine along the ridge of the noble valley, catching once a most exquisite view of Beyrout, with the curving shore and blue sea, until we came to the famous Jisr el Hajjr (bridge of stone), a grand scene indeed. This Neba el Lebben (fountain of milk) is the chief source of the Kelb, and here the river rushes in three tremendous cascades from the top of Sunnîn.

forcing its way through the limestone walls, under white masses of foam, and falls into a boiling cauldron just above the bridge, whence it tumbles down headlong into the valley in roaring torrents. The rock forms a natural but oblique bridge over the torrent, 163 feet span and 80 feet in height. The view from the bottom of the chasm is truly sublime, the mountains forming fine contrasts of browns and bright reds with the snowy summits and the stern grey crags; while all about the bridge and the cascades the loveliest flowers grow in wild profusion, including pink convolvulus and blue forget-me-not. In a cavern under the arch, in the very midst of the deafening roar, some shepherds had made a home; the wife was churning butter from goat's milk in a very primitive churn, nothing more than a goat's skin, filled with milk, which was tied on the end of a long stick, itself mounted on a tripod of sticks stuck in the ground, between which the skin was swung backwards and forwards.

After this we continued along the side of the valley under the snowy head of Sunnin, rolling clouds of mist occasionally wrapping him mysteriously from sight; and passing over some very perilous places by the Neba el Asel (fountain of honey), for we had lost our path, we began to ascend the very steep pass which separates the valley of the Nahr el Kelb from that of the Nahr Ibrahim. It was very difficult and severe for the mules, and Habeeb watched his canteen with great anxiety: one block they scrambled up was very nearly four feet high, and our horses made a great fuss about it, although we dismounted to ease them. We were, however, well rewarded on reaching the top, for the scene was superbly grand,—the snow all round us and under us, and a kind of glacier above our head. Then came a zigzag descent, which it is pleasanter to remember than it was to perform: the muleteers requested us to dismount, and after riding for some way we did so, for the sensation was not a pleasant one, when looking down the fearful depth as one's horse struggled over the masses of rock at the edge of the very steep and narrow path.

The valley of the Nahr Ibrahim, the ancient river Adonis, is wilder and sterner than that of the Kelb. We had intended on reaching it to have gone direct to Afka, the source of the river, but the inhabitants seem to be as wild and stern as the valley itself, and our dragoman declared himself afraid to venture without further tidings of their politics at the moment, as war had just broken out between the Metouaalees, who chiefly occupy these mountains, and the Christians; and some sanguinary murders had quite lately taken place. We were not at all willing to give up seeing this celebrated spot, when we had really got within reach of it, and we felt pretty sure that as English ladies we had not much to fear; so we told him to settle it as he pleased and do the best he could, only explaining to him that we intended to go to Afka, and go we would, somehow or other; but, to give him time to gather tidings, &c., we agreed to defer the visit till the next morning, and so we turned away westward, and rode on for an hour or so till we came to a good camping ground at a place called the "round meadow," just opposite the village of Amhaz, on the other side of the magnificent and savagely wild ravine. Immediately above our tents were steep mountains, partly green and cultivated, but with masses of white and yellow crags breaking out on the side, some shaped like grotesque statues; and on the opposite side of the valley uprose stern walls, one above the other, of purple-grey rocks, seeming almost vertical, yet here and there terraced with narrow ledges, lined with trees that seemed to have no footing, and a thousand strange shades of colour blending on the mountain tops, till lost in the distant snow. We walked on a little beyond our tents, and there, turning a corner, was the sun shining on a mountain slope, one vast mass of glorious rhododendrons, "spreading their soft breasts, unheeding, to the breeze," and seeming like a soft veil of tender, delicate purple gauze drawn over the whole slope, so radiantly lovely one could never forget it.

The cold forbade all sleep; perished and frozen through the night, we gladly welcomed the morning light and hot coffee. Meantime Habeeb had consulted several peasants about our going on to Afka, and they all declared that it would be very dangerous; however, at last, by good fortune, we captured a peasant whom Habeeb had known before, and believed trustworthy, and who was himself a Metouaalee,—a fine hook-nosed dark fellow, with a long beard and good teeth, armed with gun and dagger, like every peasant and shepherd in the district,—and he engaged to conduct us safely there and back again. So we rode on along an excellent path for about two hours, enjoying the magnificent valley and the ranges of mountains before us (looking north-east), reaching right up to the snowy Makhmel, the mountain of the Cedars, until we began a steep descent into the hollow where the source of the Ibrahim lay; the wood increasing till it became quite like a park,—pines, lignum vitæ, oak, terebinth, and fine lofty walnuts. We were fully occupied with the delightful view, when—on suddenly turning the brow of a cliff, we found the narrow path closed by fifteen men, who started up apparently from out of the rock, and pointing their guns at us demanded our business; a parley and explanation ensued, and we immediately became excellent friends, the secret of which sudden transition we did not know till the day after, when the dragoman acknowledged that he had informed them, not only that we were English, but also near relations of Mr. Wood, our late Consul at Damascus, who did so much for the Metouaalees and Druzes that his very name is a passport still among them. We were equally innocent of the relationship and of the falsehood, but we reaped its benefit.

The mountains now rose in a close semicircle to the height of two thousand feet from the bottom of the deep dell, their nearly perpendicular sides dotted over with tufts of prickly oak and other shrubs; the bottom itself filled with houses among gardens of pomegranates and figs, shaded by noble walnut trees; while rushing out from a cavern under the great cliff was the cascade and source we had come to see. There was not very much water in it at this time, but we did not regret it; the divided cascades were prettier than a larger single one, and the sheets of foam were quite wide enough to be very grand and beautiful. The wild luxuriance of foliage about the boiling waters much increases their beauty, and the dark cavern, with the monstrous black mouth through which they pour, is fringed with tremulous maiden-hair and other delicate ferns. A peasant told us that sometimes in summer the stream sinks into so small a compass that persons have crept into the cavern itself, where there is even now a small ruined building at the very back of the cave, probably a shrine or sanctuary for the most secret rites of the Greek worship. At the most picturesque part of the lower cascade, on a little cliff are the remains of the old

Temple of Venus, one hundred feet by fifty; little of ornamental work is left, beyond bits of cornice, but all the stones we saw were of grey granite smoothly hewn. This Temple was a very famous and highly honoured shrine, for here, beside this foamy fountain, the beautiful Adonis was said to have received his death-wound from the boar, and here Venus is still heard, by imaginative persons, lamenting the untimely fate of the young hunter,—a victim to the cruel jealousy of Mars, who, distracted at the caresses lavished on him by the fair goddess, took the form of the ferocious animal he felt himself to resemble under such pangs, and pierced the youth with his cruel tusks. The despairing Venus metamorphosed his white and beautiful corpse into a white rose—a flower ever sacred to herself—which was afterwards changed into a red one, in consequence of a drop of her own rosy blood, drawn by the prick of a thorn, falling on the flower. Thus she still kept him beside her in emblem; but her grief was so great that the gods in pity permitted him to return to earth for six months of the year; the time of his departure from her side was announced by the sanguinary hue imparted to the falling waters which then

“Run purple to the sea, suffused with blood of Thammuz.”*

At this moment, thus advised by Nature herself, the annual and solemn fête was celebrated, chiefly by women, who sat on the thresholds of their houses tearing their hair and weeping loudly. The statue of Venus was exhibited covered with a veil, the head leaning on her left hand, and the whole figure expressing sadness and weeping; on the day of her invocation, it is said that a fire, bright as a star, invariably fell precipitously from the sky into the water*; this they believed to be Venus, but, probably, it was only an immense tear mingling in the blood of her lover. It is curious that the Jews should have adopted this Phœnician idolatry so entirely as to have carried its observance into the very courts of the sanctuary of the Lord God, where the Spirit shows them to Jeremiah "weeping for Thammuz," with their faces turned "towards the north,"† offering to her cakes and incense, and pouring out drink-offerings before her; the women during this festival wore men's clothes, while the men wore women's clothes, as was generally the custom where two persons (as Osiris and Isis, Venus and Adonis, Hercules and Hebe, &c.) were celebrated together, stores of dresses being kept in the temples for that purpose,—an allusion to which is made in Deut. xxii. 5, and 2 Kings x. 22, and possibly in Rev. iii. 4, in speaking of Sardis, a city consecrated to the double worship of Hercules and Diana. The celebration lasted two days: the first was spent in lamentations and wailings, as we have said; on the second they danced, shouted and sang for joy, as if Adonis had returned to life.

* Milton.

So runs the legend,—under which, as is almost invariably the case, one finds the natural fact of which the story is but the poetic clothing. Adonis, or Adonai—a Hebrew title signifying Lord—the friend and favourite of Apollo, was made the personification of the Sun, or summer, by the Phœnicians; the boar and the bear were both used as emblems of winter, whose rude onset signifies in the fable the departure of the summer sunshine, vanquished by the cold blasts of winter. So the fable of the daughter of Plenty, carried off to dwell beneath the earth for half the year,—so the Tyrians, Romans, and Cappadocians kept some of their gods in iron chains till the winter was gone; then the gods were supposed to be re-awakened, and rose up endowed with new strength and power. In the Syrian mountains the winter is short, but the contrast must be quite terrible between the blazing and scorching heat of the long summer, and the severity of the winter, especially in a place like Afka, surrounded by the loftiest and most snowy summits of the whole range; they might well consider it an annual death of Nature, and nowhere would spring be more sudden, beautiful, and gladdening than here—more completely the resuscitation of a dead body. It is related, by an eye-witness*, that at the end of the days of mourning a dead man's head was thrown into the river Adonis, which carried it down to the sea: this is in fact precisely the same legend as that of Osiris, who, after being murdered by Typhon, the Evil One, was cast into the sea, and his mangled remains found by Isis on the Phœnician coast,—to celebrate which mystery the priests of Alexandria used annually to throw a head amidst great pomp into the sea, which held in its mouth a letter declaring that Osiris had come to life again. Both allude to the desolation of the earth at one season, and the return of verdure and fecundity at another.

* Nicephorus.

† Ezek. viii. 14; Jer. vii. 18, xlv. 17—28. It was, in fact, part of the Astarte or Venus worship.

The word Afka is said to be derived from the Hebrew Apheka, meaning to hold or embrace, in allusion to the embraces of Venus and Adonis; but, as it also means a basin, it is more likely to describe the mountains surrounding or embracing the deep basin of the sacred glen, which is shaped precisely like the interior of a tea-cup, only with one side lower than the rest.

* Lucian.

It is said that a good deal of these old ceremonials still remain among the wild people of Afka, but how much or what we could not learn; they were much more intent upon questioning and examining us than upon imparting any information, *and possibly they might have resented any very curious inquiries respecting their religion, the peculiarities of which are, I believe, very little known. They are said, like the Shyites, to acknowledge 'Ali as the only true successor of the Prophet; but they have probably many other more peculiar doctrines of their own, besides their scrupulousness in what they eat, drink, or touch, all which is carried to the very highest pitch. They would die rather than drink from the same vessel that a Christian or a dog has touched; and it is in truth natural that a band of lawless and savage men, living in secluded and wild mountainous districts, should have adopted local ideas, especially such as were sufficiently exciting to fascinate their untutored minds. But that any traces of such rites and ceremonies should have survived the fifteen centuries since Constantine destroyed the temple at Afka, is at least very curious—if it is true.

Wild and savage as the Metouaalees are, they were civil enough to us,—the men assisting us to scramble up and down the rocks by the waterfall, holding our horses, &c.; the women, who had evidently never before seen a Frank lady, gathered round us with eager curiosity to examine our clothes, which appeared to be quite incomprehensible to them. Our large shady hats were subjects of great admiration, and they laughed long and loudly over the size of our waists, which they insisted on spanning with their hands, until their embraces became so troublesome that we mounted our horses, and, with many lookings back at the beautiful and romantic spot, re-ascended the hill into the upper part of the valley, where the cool fresh air was most refreshing after the suffocating heat of the pent-up glen, as we retraced our steps of the morning and passed on still along the south side of the Nahr Ibrahim (or River Adonis) towards the sea. We were half way down the very worst of all possible descents, jumping, slipping, and struggling among huge rocks and impossible crannies, when two of our horses took to fighting, and before the attendants could reach them one horse had toppled down part of the precipice and was lost to view. We had many more miles to go, and the adventure was somewhat dismaying. However, some stiff bushes had kindly broken his fall, and the horse was picked up; the saddle, which had been a good deal broken, was patched together somehow, the things tumbled out of the saddlebags re-collected, and we continued our tortuous way, not pausing again till we reached a very beautiful spot, where the tents were already pitched, called Wātr-el-Jauz — the “country of walnut trees,” but the walnuts have now disappeared — and we sat under the shade of a grove of fine willows, enjoying fresh views of the beautiful mountains. No day’s ride had given us a greater variety of magnificent scenery than this one, and very lovely it had been under a cloudless sky and brilliant sunshine.

But the next day was almost more beautiful, for after crossing the hill on which we had encamped the sea was added to the still more extended and splendid view. Habeeb averred that Hermon was visible, but we could not distinguish its cone. And then came an apparently endless descent of deep and very narrow ravines of great beauty, one after another, filled with flowers and fragrant shrubs and pleasant villages, with weird and savage rocks and stern grey crags, and such an abominable path that more than once we had to dismount and scramble down on foot. At last we reached Ghazîr, a beautifully situated, large and thriving village, full of fruit gardens, roses and myrtles, and with a great number of convents and French filatures. We rested here for an hour in a hospitable merchant's house, and then continued our way, descending literally through fissures in the rocks, till we had reached the sands of the sea shore, and gladly found ourselves in the lovely Bay of Jouneh. Nothing could be prettier than the scattering of this bright-looking town over the steep cliffs, crowned with white Convents behind it; the curve of the bay was so graceful, and the little gardens so rich and pretty, and the sea breeze so fresh and pleasant after the hot ravines we had come from. There were several ships in the bay waiting for corn. We turned off from the sea to pass through the atrocious paths of pretty Zouk Mehayl, and by the fine college for Maronite priests, called Antourah, most romantically situated in the bosom of a lofty gorge, surrounded by gardens of arbutus, ilex, pomegranate, &c. &c., which we should have liked to see, but had not time enough.

On leaving Zouk we found ourselves in an extensive pine forest on the upper side of the Nahr el Kelb, through which we descended by a winding path. Nothing could exceed the rich beauty of this narrow valley, the river winding at the bottom, and both sides clothed with wood. At the foot of the descent is one of the chief sources of the river, welling forth from a cavern, round which the ferns hung in green wreaths and garlands, as if veiling the source from common eyes. We had to scramble on stepping-stones through a swampy thicket of St. John's wort, rhododendrons, myrtle, and oleander, in order to reach it, but it was worth the trouble. There are much finer caverns with stalactites at another source of the same river, somewhere higher up in the mountains, but these we never reached, not having heard of them till shortly before we left Beyrout: they can hardly be prettier than these. It was half-past seven when we had regained the summit of the hill side, for very steep and difficult it was to our tired horses and our tired selves, and the light was gone. We had still a long ride over the mountain, guided by a shepherd, and then came a descent to the river side, which, in the darkness, was really most perilous; it was terrific enough by day, and the shepherd seemed so shocked at the ladies having to descend it in the night, that he offered to stay with us, and very useful he was in encouraging the unfortunate horses, who would fain have stood still instead of struggling down the rocks, which in the darkness we could not attempt on foot: and had not the moon helped us in some parts we must have remained on the mountain all night; so we were indeed thankful to reach the bottom without any accident, and to find ourselves close to the mouth of the Kelb, looking doubly lovely in the moonlight. We pushed through the oleanders, and forded the stream (though the current was very strong for the weary horses to withstand), finding our tents pitched beyond the river at the edge of the waves, and very gladly ate our dinners and went to bed, after being thirteen hours on horseback; and late we stayed the next morning resting, with the tent door drawn back, watching the little waves curling up close to us, and the fishing boats lazily sailing over the blue waters.

However, we had still a long way to get home, so we mounted at eleven, and rode along the shore as far as Antēlyias, where we turned aside into charming gardens, bowered and hedged with myrtle and clematis, both of which the horses greedily devoured, and then up steep mountains, thickly covered with myrtle all in blossom, perfuming the air delightfully; a lovely ride, but the path turned round and round till we began to fancy ourselves bewitched and fated "never to return." At last, at near 4 P.M., we reached Brumâna, and completed the circle we had been seven days in travelling; and in another hour we were very happy to find ourselves once more in our pretty home, where the little dog nearly went into fits, sobbing with joy at seeing us again.

CHAP. X.

OLD PHœNICIANS AND MODERN DRUZES.

ONE day early in July we had occasion to go down to Beyrout to despatch some business, and when there we found ourselves suddenly included in a hastily settled ride to Saïda, the ancient Sidon. The opportunity of accompanying some friends was too pleasant to be resisted, and the arrangements were so managed that we were not to be troubled with mules and canteen; a Saïda gentleman, Signor Pietri Santi, then in Beyrout, having offered us the use of rooms in his house. The heat in Beyrout was now very great indeed, and the mosquitos almost intolerable: we felt them all the worse as there are scarcely any at Beit Miry, the bloodthirsty creatures seldom taking the trouble of flying so high above the plains. We therefore settled to make our journey by night, and to rest by day. We had, too, a glorious full moon that lighted us through the narrow lanes of the town and the pine-forest, with a cool flood of silver-coloured light that was infinitely delightful, hiding much of the monotony of what is sometimes considered a tiresome ride, although there is really constant change,—the steep rocky shore, here and there dressed with olive groves, alternating with smooth curving sands. It is very wild and perhaps dreary by day, and to add to this impression, in one place where we were threading the broken rocks by the sea, a hyena bounded past, so close as almost to touch my horse's nose: he had been lying on our track: the kawass, and, indeed, all of us were much disappointed at his escape, but the rocks were too bad to attempt a chase in the darkness. Further on, where the Khan Khulda marks the site of the ancient city of Heldua, we came upon camels swinging along under enormous burdens that seemed like walking houses, almost concealing the beast beneath, while at top of each lay the driver fast asleep, tied on to his own goods!—and we were told that they will often go on and on in this way, almost without any rest or food, for a week at a time. After fording the Da'mour, where we recognised the richly-wooded valley of Deir el Kamar, we stopped at Neby Yunus, the Khan of the prophet Jonah, and, dismounting, fell fast asleep on the sand over our coffee. The light was breaking as we awakened half an hour after, and found ourselves in a pretty sandy bay, at a picturesque khan, beside a fine grove of tamarisk trees, a sapphire-coloured sky overhead, and the moon—one large mass of glowing silver, most wonderfully dyed and crimsoned with the flush of morning,—standing on the very horizon of the sea, while behind us, above the grove, the glorious "Daughter of the Morning" shone with steady golden light, seeming to grow larger and larger, when—all in a moment, up shot a flood of crimson and orange, lighting up the rocks and the sands and the trees and the sky, like a marble statue transformed into a living breathing mortal; and the moon, after lingering a few minutes as if to rival the red light of day, sank down behind the waves, and when we turned round a moment after the morning star was gone too. It was one of the prettiest scenes possible—a perfect vignette of beauty—and the show was not yet over;

for now dark masses which we had taken for stones and rocks on the sand, wakened up, stretched, shook themselves and arose, and in two minutes their horses and camels and mules were shaken up and mounted, and they, with their bright-coloured burdens, rode off clearing the place, and changing it really like a magic-lantern slide, or a double scene in a theatre. Then the sunbeams streamed widely over the bay, and down came troops of chattering girls, in huge scarlet trousers and white veils, to fill their pitchers at the fountain — the super-excellent fountain, for this water is sacred, and must be particularly sweet, the spring having appeared on the very spot where the good-natured whale was so kind as to come to shore and vomit forth poor Jonah (Yunus in Arabic) after his long and uncomfortable voyage in its stomach. It would be difficult to prove which of the reports is the true one, but other people believe that the whale turned aside from the Great Sea into the quiet bay of Iskenderoon, and laid Jonah among the oleanders that fringe its shore, in imitation of Moses in the bulrushes; and if the whale was only careering about between Joppa and Tarsus, one place is as likely as the other.

Many of the Jews consider the Book of the Prophet Jonah to be only a parable, or moral story, written long after the time of Cyrus, and intended to account for the fact that the city of Nineveh was not so ruthlessly destroyed, or the inhabitants so cruelly afflicted, as the Prophets had predicted: they say that it is full of impossibilities; as if all miracles were not, apparently, contrary to Nature. Possibly they are less unwilling to repudiate the book altogether than to acknowledge so direct a type of the Resurrection of our Lord as is contained in the account, or to read the judgment on their own generation who "repented not," although "a Greater than Jonas" preached to them.

Another mile or so brought us to the brow of the last headland, and to our first view of Saïda—and a lovely view it was: there she sat at the edge of the deep blue water, pale brown and purple mountains embracing her in warm, giant arms, with battlemented walls and towers round her,—all white and glistening in the early sunshine—like a swan sitting by the sea-shore, or a white dove resting on the crest of the cliff. We turned down to the beach and continued our road on the soft, slushy sand along the edge of the wave, sometimes stopping to pick up some particularly pretty shell, oftener to watch the colours of "the last foam

That trembled on the sand with rainbow hues" *

from the bright morning sun. The view grew prettier and prettier as we distinguished the high castle above the town, built by Louis XI. of France, and the other fortress, standing on rocks which run far out into the sea and are connected with the shore by a low bridge of nine arches. We entered the town about 8 A. M., and wound through the narrow streets and gay bazaars, and still gayer, thriving-looking people in bright, clean dresses, to the house of Signor Santi, where we were soon established in a pleasant saloon furnished with divans and mats: one expects nothing more in an Arab reception room, unless it be a tray of pipes and nargilehs. The heat and the mosquitos drove away all thoughts or hopes of sleep, and we could only lie still and pant till the cool breeze of the sunset hour enabled us to visit some hospitable French Arabs living in the French quartier, or khan as it is called, a huge building as large as a London square, erected by the Emir Fakr-ed-dîn for the use of the French merchants in the seventeenth century; a large tank and fountain occupy the centre of the court in a garden of banana, acacia, and lemon trees, which made the evening breeze come into the apartments laden with perfumes. Each family has its own suite of rooms, communicating with the rest by a wide corridor extending round the court on both stories to walk and lounge in: it seemed to us a most pleasant residence, with a promenade on the house-top where one could enjoy fresher breezes and a lovely view of the city. Saïda is one of the prettiest towns in Syria; the Mosques and baths are particularly picturesque and almost handsome; the two Castles and the fine rocks with the breakers constantly dashing over them, and the rich fruit gardens all around the city, form a most charming tout ensemble. The view from the Château of St. Louis is equally pretty and more extensive, the headland of Sour (the ancient Tyre) bounding the scene. This castle is kept in good repair, and was originally a strong fortress; that on the rocks is very much shattered, but worth seeing: Saïda is a place for endless sketching both within and without the town, and would repay an artist for a stay of some duration.

* Thalaba.

Warned by the heat and closeness of the house on the first day, we established ourselves on the following morning inside a Wely or Saint's tomb on the sea-shore a little to the north of the town, — a spot to be recommended to future travellers, as we found the heat much less intolerable there than elsewhere; we were close to a spring and to the sea, with the lovely fruit gardens close to us. The tomb, which occupies one half of the building, is walled off, and locked up; the rest is a small square whose arched roof is supported by sixteen columns and is raised on steps at each side: such are most of the Welys in Syria, and they are often very agreeable resting-places. In the afternoon we rode through some miles of the gardens, the richest, we were told, in all Syria; for here were not merely lofty trees tangled over with thick bowers of vines laden with luscious grapes,—orange, lemon, fig, almond, and plum trees, fragrant with perfume and bending with fruit,—but banana trees also, rare in this country, with enormous clusters of the rich brown and orange fruit hanging down among the splendid leaves and beautiful purple blossoms above them. The prickly-pear hedges were full of fruit, and roses and honeysuckles grew everywhere. But the glory of Saïda are her apricot groves: from her—her sole commerce now—is exported the greater part of the mish-mish consumed in Egypt, Damascus chiefly supplying Syria; and there must be nearly as much mish-mish eaten in Egypt as we consume of oranges or apples in the whole of Great Britain. The fruit of all kinds grown at Saïda is considered of a better quality than any other in Syria.

Sidon was one of the most ancient cities in the world, and is one of the very few of those (such as Damascus, Hamah, and Hebron) on which a modern city or town, bearing the same name, exists at the present day; it was the chief port and capital city of Phœnicia, and the mother of a hundred other cities whose very sites have been forgotten in the dark ages of history. Six of the sons of Canaan*, the grandson of Noah, founded the principal cities of Phœnicia (Sidon, Arka, Sinna, Aradus, Simyra, and Hamath); hence their descendants were called Canaanites, the Greeks afterwards giving them the name of Phœnicians. Their coast extended from Mount Carmel to Mount Casius, along which numerous ports and cities were placed, the inhabitants of which appear to have attained a high degree of civilisation and even of luxury. Dismayed, however, at the extraordinary success of the divinely-supported arms of Israel, as step by step they victoriously subdued nearly the whole of Palestine, the Phœnicians emigrated in large numbers — “fleeing from the face of the robber Joshua,” as they expressed it — and planted kingdoms and colonies throughout the coasts of the Mediterranean, founding cities in Africa, Spain, Italy, Greece, and the isles of the Ægean sea. They need not, however, have been so much afraid, for Asher, to whom the land containing Sidon fell, never took the city or drove the Phœnicians out of the country*; and God, in his anger against Israel, permitted these and some other tribes to dwell in the land in order “to prove Israel,” and “to teach them war.” Unhappily the Israelites not only profited by their teaching in this and in other accomplishments†, but they also learned from them their abominable idolatries: from them came the worship of Baal, the Sun,—the ruins of whose Phœnician-built Temples abound in Syria, and especially about Hermon, whence arose its name of Baal-hermon, although the Sidonians called it “Sirion” or the “Breastplate,—and from them came also the worship of Astarte (or Venus), the enticing goddess, after whom even the heart of the wise Solomon turned from the paths of virtue, and to whose honour he erected an altar, or “high place,” on the Mount of

* Gen. x. 15—19.

* Judges i. 31, 32. † Ibid. ii. 20—23, iii. 1, 2. ‡ 1 Kings, v. 6.

Corruption over the brook Kedron; and it was from Sidon also that Ahab, king of Israel, took the wicked princess Jezebel for his wife, the great promoter of Baal worship.

Sidon was in the height of her glory about a thousand years before the coming of our Lord; her colonies, of which Carthage was the chief, had then spread the knowledge of letters*, science, and art over all the then known world, and her ships had sailed round the southern extremity of Africa, in passing from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean.† Her daughter Tyre was still more flourishing and renowned than herself — “perfect of beauty,” “very glorious in the midst of the seas,” — but she was slain, destroyed, “brought utterly to ashes;” and Sidon fell also, destroyed alternately by Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans. “Pestilence and blood” has been indeed “sent into her streets,” and “judgments executed in her.”‡ “Blush with shame, O Sidon! thou city sitting beside the waters, the strength of the sea; thou mayest indeed say, I have not travailed, I have nourished neither young men nor virgins; for now none remain unto me: it is as though I had never brought forth a child!”§

We left the city at 8 P. M., passing through groups of people sitting in clusters in the streets and on the beach, smoking and listening to gesticulating storytellers,—and had a delightful ride along the shore, in the sweet, fresh, warm night air, by the light of the magnificent moon. Twice we stopped at the roadside khans to drink excellent coffee, and morning began to break as we entered the olive groves and gardens about Beyrout; they were gay with flowers — among them the colocynth

* Herodotus, book v. 58.

† Ibid. book iv. 42.

‡ Ezek. xxvii. xxviii. 22, 23.

§ See Isaiah xxiii. 4.

(coloquintida), a queer-looking creeping plant with a fruit like green pills, now (happily) so much disused in medicine, that it no longer pays to collect it. We refreshed ourselves with quantities of the cool, sweet, prickly-pear from the baskets of pretty women, who were gathering them in the early dew; and as the blue mist cleared away, the mountains looked so lovely, that we felt well repaid for the fatigue of the nocturnal ride; we reached the hotel at six P.M. and found occupation for some hours in slaughtering the fleas we had gathered up in the khans en route, — and at midnight we mounted again to ride up to our dear little home at Beit Miry.

One morning at Beit Miry, the Druze muleteer who had accompanied us to Deir el Kamar, came to request the honour of our presence at his marriage, which was to take place that day; and on our promising to go to it, he left a present of an oke of pine fruit kernels; as the Druze custom is to leave a gift with every guest invited to the wedding. We were summoned by a messenger, who said "the feast was ready," at 2.30 P. M.; and on reaching the Druze quarter, a volley of muskets saluted us from a group of gaily dressed men surrounding the bridegroom, attired in new clothes, and looking very sheepish and uncomfortable. On arriving at the house, which was at the further end of the quarter, we found the little outer court full of old hags, horned and veiled, cooking in stew-pans over fires made on the ground; the cuisine did not look very appetisante. The house consisted of only one large room, the roof supported by two pillars in the centre and quite full of women, to whom we were introduced by the bridegroom's father — a venerable and handsome man, with a long white beard; his dirty old wife made many salaams, and kissed our hands, as did nearly all the guests in the room; there were both Druzes and Christians in the room — the latter dressed in gay coloured coarse muslins and pretty white muslin veils, hanging down behind their heads, some of which were finely embroidered, with quantities of gold ornaments and bracelets; the former in dirty blue or brown serge gowns, and veils of the same stuff in black, which they held over their faces when any man appeared; nearly every woman had a small infant in her arms, and the floor was strewn with bigger infants — small and large squalling alike most of the time. The Druze women are usually less pretty than the Maronite women, and their costume makes them appear still plainer: but they are finely made and have good manners, though, like all Oriental women, they are far less charming than their husbands, whose open, free, graceful and polished bearing is remarked by all travellers. A place was immediately cleared for us and a carpet spread, on which we sat to take ever so many glasses of eau sucrée which we disposed of to the children, much to the delight of both children and mothers, but the heat became so intolerable that another carpet was placed for us on a shady terrace: whence we soon saw the bridegroom arrive at his own house, escorted by his friends, who fired muskets all the way.

Our seat faced the whole of the beautiful ravine of El Metn, and we presently saw some bright spots emerging from the thick woods at the bottom of the valley, and winding up the steep zigzag ascent on our side; this was the bridal procession. First came three mules, carrying the bride's bed and a great box, painted scarlet and adorned with flowers, containing her wardrobe; then her father, with a snowy turban, mounted on an ass, followed by a number of relations on foot; and lastly the bride herself, surrounded by women, but without her mother, whom etiquette keeps at home. As soon as she entered the district, firing began; after this a volley was fired at every zigzag on the road, the unceasing noise and shouting seeming much to annoy the horse on which she was mounted. She was closely veiled, first with yellow silk, then green gauze, and, over both, a white cotton eezar; and one of her hands, wrapped in a yellow cotton handkerchief, was held the whole time on the top of her head, in token of submission and obedience to her new duties; sometimes the weary arm was supported by a neighbour, but one or other hand was never taken down. When she came near the house the firing and shouting redoubled, and a score of persons went to meet her, among them the bridegroom, who bowed to her; then a very stupid sham battle ensued, one man on each side running into a vacant space alternately, and firing his musket in the air; this lasted about ten minutes, before she was allowed to proceed; her father lifted her from her horse, and the door was shut upon her and the women for a short time.

When we were summoned inside we found a gaudy shawl hung against the wall of the room, with her back to which the bride was standing on a pile of cushions, like an effigy in a church; she was unveiled, and proved very pretty, fair as an English girl, with light brown hair, the only Easternism in her face being the highly arched eyebrows, which are artificially formed in childhood. She was dressed in a red silk vest over a white silk chemise, and a green silk pelisse over that, fastened with large silver buttons, and several silver chains, to each of which hung a triangular silver case containing a hezab or charm, and a very massive and costly gold necklace; a muslin handkerchief lay over her head, but no tantour, the chief Sheikh of the Druzes having just published a command, we were told, that they should be given up by all but the old women. Here the unhappy girl was to stand for three whole days, with her eyes closed and her hand over the top of her head in the presence of the guests; even in the night, should any visitor come in, she must resume her place! the friends sometimes whispered in her ear, but she is supposed to be incapable of speech or sight till the contract is signed and her husband appears. During these three days no man enters the room. She looked very hot and tired, and flushed still more deeply as she stepped down from the cushions to kiss the English ladies' hands, in honour of whom she was allowed to lift her eyelids for one moment, whereby we saw her pretty brown eyes; after which her nearest relation, a very jolly looking woman, stood before her, and, pushing back the crowd a little, flourished each present brought by the guests, one by one, over her head, screaming out the name of the donor and the substance and value of the gift; and before she deposited it in the bride's pocket spinning round between each announcement in a wonderful jigging dance, and giving the mountain cry of joy or triumph till one was nearly deafened; it is a very peculiar whistling scream, beginning on a high note and then jumping to the octave above, something like the Tyrolese jodl, only simpler, and never at any distance musical: we learned to know the cry well and sadly afterwards.

Having stood this as long as we could and our hands aching with squeezes and kisses, we bade them good-bye and departed, sending our present of three dollars in the evening, as we were told that was considered much more aristocratic and dignified than giving it at the time. The bridegroom and all his friends were sitting in rows on the house-tops, eating an enormous dinner spread upon nice mats; the dinner continues all day long, giving them fortunately something to do in the long interval before the contract is drawn; the Druzes have no religious ceremonial of marriage. The bridegroom, a fine tall young man, seemed very anxious and curious about his bride, whose face he had never seen, and to whom he had never spoken; he was much pleased with the praises we bestowed on her, which, as Europeans, we could do;—an Arab could not have spoken to him of his wife.

We learned on this day something of the division of property among the Lebanon mountaineers. On the death of a man all his possessions are divided among his children, with no distinction of the first-born, the sons each taking twice as much as the daughters, who are supposed to be provided for by their marriage. Should the land-property be too small for division, it is sold, and the proceeds divided in the same proportions; if there is any choice in the lots, the youngest child chooses first, and so on, the eldest coming the last; and if there are any young children, the largest portion is reserved for them.

CHAP. XI.

THE BATTLE.

DURING the first six or seven centuries after the Resurrection of our Lord, a number of sects sprung up in the bosom of the Christian Church, nearly all of them finding birth in the North of Syria, and in Egypt. To say nothing of the Sabellians and Arians of Africa, or the Nestorians and Eutychians of Constantinople, the semi-converted Jews of Syria split into Nazarenes, Ebionites, and other sects, while among the Arabs of the north and north-east, Jacobites, Monophysites, Mariamites and Collyridians, Gnostics and Docetes, spread themselves over the mountains of the Lebanon, and the countries of Aleppo, Diarbekr, and Mesopotamia. These mountains, and the rocks of the Desert, were soon thickly peopled with hermits and recluses, singly and in bands, living in different degrees of asceticism. Those of the mountain tribes, who had been converted to Christianity, were united under a Patriarch (Batrak, in Arabic), as their spiritual head, and were governed by Emirs or Sheikhs of the different districts.

About fifty years after the birth of Muhammad, and before the Reformed Religion taught by him had made any progress beyond the immediate neighbourhood of Medina and Mecca, or the confines of Arabia, one of those Christians who had retired into a cave in north Syria, in order to pursue his studies and meditations uninterruptedly, made himself remarkable by the peculiar sanctity of his life, and the unusual depth of wisdom that fell from his lips. This man was called Hanna (the Arabic of John) Maroun, — the cave where he dwelt, was close to one of the chief sources of the Orontes, the 'Ain or spring mentioned in Numb. xxxiv. 11.

About this time, the quarrels between Constantinople and Rome, for the spiritual jurisdiction of the Christians in Syria, broke forth, and emissaries from each were spread through the country, for the purpose of influencing the people. Hanna Maroun was at once elected by the united voices of the mountaineers, as their adviser and leader: he immediately declared himself for the Latins, acknowledged the Pope as his spiritual master, and put himself at the head of a large body of followers. Those who acknowledged Constantinople as the throne of their spiritual and political Head, separated from the followers of Maroun, and gave themselves the name of Melekites (from melek, the Arabic for sovereign), which they bear to this day *, but they are more usually called the people of Roum (Roumelia), as members of the Greek Church, whence they then received their Patriarch and their tenets; they are of course, now as then, equally with the Maronites, subjects of the Turkish Empire, but they hold the doctrines of the Church of Russia, and look to her Emperor as their chief Protector.

The tenets of the Maronites are simply those of Rome — their colleges and schools being presided over by teachers and priests sent from that city: they submitted more entirely to the Pope in 1180, giving up at that time the Monophysitism, which had till then tinged their tenets, and obtaining in return the immense concession of retaining many of their own peculiar customs,—a very remarkable, and perhaps unparalleled, concession on the part of Rome. They have a very large number of monks, who of course take vows of celibacy and poverty, but the parish priests are almost always married: the people communicate in both kinds, and their service is conducted in Syriac,—a language till lately well understood by them, but now entirely disused, since only three villages are existing where Syriac is still spoken,—the Gospels, and other parts, are read also in Arabic. There are between 90 and 100 convents, containing about 1500 monks, and 500 or 600 nuns: the number of the Maronite population is differently stated, but is most probably about 233,000 souls. There are large numbers of them at Aleppo, Tripoli, Beyrout, and Saïda, but they may be said chiefly to inhabit the Lebanon, the Kesrouân district of which is almost entirely occupied by them: the principal number of their convents are placed there, and about the Cedars, and in the Kesrouân they have their great Priest's college of Antourah.

* They also separated in the same way from the Copts in Egypt, and took the same name of Melekites. See Lane's "Modern Egyptians."

Hanna Maroun died in A. D. 701, and was buried at Hāmāh, his tomb becoming at once, and for a very long time after, a place of pilgrimage to both parties among the mountaineers,—his remains were believed to perform miracles, and were visited by pilgrims from even Egypt and all parts of Turkey. A Convent was soon founded beside the tomb, the monks excavating cells in the living rock for themselves, and building up loop-holed walls overhanging the ravine below—as in the convents of Mar Antoun and Khannobîn; to this Convent the Pope sent a present of a fine Library.

Among these monks, the belligerent leaders of the Maronites for the future were found. At one time, intoxicated with some successes over the partisans of Constantinople, the Maronites marched down to Jerusalem, when the Mooslims, taking advantage of their absence, seized and pillaged the Convent, massacring the unfortunate monks that had remained there; after this the Maronites and Melekites wisely made peace, having enemies enough to contend with, without fighting their fellow-Christians.

The Maronites hastened to join the bands of the Crusaders on their arrival in Syria, and did them much service in replenishing their ranks, as hundreds and thousands of gallant Franks were slain in the field or died in the camp. At Damietta, in 1249, vast numbers of the Maronites fell fighting under the banner of Louis XI.; a fresh band, however, joined him afterwards at Akka, and there exists still in Paris copies of a letter written by Louis XI. to both the Emir of the Lebanon and to their Patriarch, assuring the Maronites of the protection of France for ever: it is dated May 21, 1250; Henri Quatre, in 1520, was addressed by Sultan Suleymān II., with the title of "Protector of the Christians of Mount Lebanon;" and exactly 400 years after, Louis XIV., and still later, Louis XV., repeated this assurance in letters addressed by them to the Patriarch of the Maronites in the Convent of Khannobîn.

Certain it is that the Maronites have a strong belief, that as they are now under the protection of France, they will one day be openly ruled by her; time will show how near this idea is to the truth. But there are plenty of facts which appear very like it; one thing is quite certain,—and that is, that gradually, cautiously, and silently the French have obtained a footing, a piéd-

à-terre, throughout the Lebanon, and nearly throughout Syria; there is scarcely a single large village in the whole of the Lebanon without a mission of one, two, or three monks, and a school taught by Lazaristes; and these are all Frenchmen; they have also missions and schools scattered throughout Syria, especially in the country round Jaffa and Jerusalem; and the Lazaristes teach so well and work their missions so thoroughly, that they are not only an immense example to us, but they are sure ultimately of success; for the Arab appreciates education,—that is to say, they love money with all their hearts, and even the poorest mountain peasant is therefore glad to have his sons taught to count and to add up piasters, and to read and write; accomplishments which they acquire with remarkable facility. In the towns they teach French also, which is gladly enough learned to aid them in commerce, and to enable them to become dragomans. Unfortunately their French education usually renders the town Arab pretentious and impertinent; the best example of which are the people of Zah'leh, where this education has been in full force for very many years, and of whom Mr. Porter says, they “are notorious for their pride, insolence, and turbulence. Family broils are incessant, and scarce a month passes without bloodshed.”*

The French have also found another method of gaining substantial influence in Syria. Wherever their Lazaristes tell them of an unusually intelligent Sheikh or person of influence, they send him letters of naturalization, and make him an honorary French subject: of course this includes, or would be found to include, the peasantry of whom each Sheikh is chief whenever the occasion needed. We learned also, on good authority, that the French Consuls along the coast have an ingenious way of recommending the crews of boats to buy a flag, bearing the Jerusalem Cross, which is blessed by the Superior of the French Convent of the Terre Sainte, the Guardian of the Holy Sepulchre; under which they sail in double security, both spiritual as well as temporal. France then claims them as her subjects, though of course they are in reality only Turkish subjects, and though all Consuls are forbidden to protect any but their own lawful countrymen: and when France requires them they will be found all ready for her service; our informant mentioned sixty-four well-manned boats whom he himself knew who had done this.

* Handbook for Syria and Palestine, vol. ii.

Nothing can be more mischievous than the various "protections" accorded by the European governments to subjects of the Sultan, Mooslim as well as Christian; they serve but to render them insolent when they have nothing to fear, and cringing when they have; besides that, the protection is very frequently extended to most worthless individuals, merely for the sake of exercising and maintaining the right; it was relying on this "protection" that made the Zah'leh people so insolent to the Mooslims, insisting on their dismounting from their horses on entering the town, and even calling their own dogs "Muhammad" before the Mooslims — of course the greatest insult that can be offered to persons who consider dogs unclean animals, — these facts we heard from the best authority; they have since been severely punished, but they most certainly brought it on themselves.

The Maronites are industrious and docile; they are intelligent and capable of immense improvement: they are brave, but they have not the pluck and fortitude of the Druzes, nor the support of an admirable organisation, combination, and obedience, which is the very backbone of the Druze people; nor have they by any means the high sense of honour which the Druzes undoubtedly possess, though of course there are honourable exceptions among them. The Maronite, when a little educated, prides himself on being rusé, but his ruse is a coarse affair in comparison to that of the Bedouin or the Druze; he is simply dishonest, though he has just wit enough to try to persuade you that cheating is the only thing of which he is perfectly incapable: if he cannot succeed in this, he tries to prove to you that what he gains is in some manner only his real due, or he assures you tout bonnement, that he felt that to your excellent heart and charitable disposition, his profit would be equally a pleasure and a gratification.

When the Greek and Latin Churches of Syria forgot their differences and united in arms against the Druzes, they were frequently victorious, but their great Druze Chief, the Emir Fakr-ed-dîn was so accomplished a general that the Druzes shortly recovered themselves, and held up their heads as proudly as ever; this Emir proved the Druzes capable of becoming active and thriving in commerce, and he would have probably made them a great people had he not taken the unhappy notion of going to Europe, where he wasted and lost both his patrimony and his patriotism.

The dreadful custom of blood-feuds, which exists throughout the mountains, is of course a terrific promoter of bloodshed. Notwithstanding this, I believe it is undoubted by all who know the Druzes well, that they would live in peace and harmony with the Christians if the Turks would let them; but these latter are unceasingly exciting them against each other, and urging them on to war for their own purposes; never can they be united as long as the Turks stand like firebrands beside both. Of course it is all done in an underhand way, but the truth will out; and no one can be any time in the country without perceiving it.

One day our Druze muleteer, at whose wedding we had been guests one month before, was driving his mule along the narrow path, when another mule, driven by a small Christian boy, jammed up against him. The Druze was a hot-tempered and foolish young fellow, and he immediately thrashed the boy with no moderate arm; the next day, the boy's father and another man, hid in a large carob tree, waylaid the Druze as he was going down to Beyrout on our commissions, and fully avenged the boy. The Druze went home with a bleeding head, and a good deal hurt, upon seeing which the women — never slow to join in a fray — took up the quarrel on both sides: they emptied each other's pitchers at the fountain, and finally broke a lot of them against the rocks: miserable trifling squabbles, but from such bagatelles many a grave and mournful tragedy has arisen. We heard that the village priest was trying to make peace between them, and we hoped that there would be no worse results from this, than from a hundred other petty quarrels we had heard of between Christian and Druze.

The week before, an English friend of ours* had arrived in Beit Miry, and taken a house at the same end of the village as our own, but over the brow of the mountain, and therefore commanding the northern view of the valley of El Metn; in the centre, in fact, of the Druze quarter. The moon was now, on the evening of the 13th of August, at the full, and we went over to see how gloriously beautiful the valley, headed by snowy Sunnîn, looked in the moonlight from his verandah: this was three days after the muleteer's quarrel. While we were enjoying what was really a magnificent and lovely scene, the mist wreaths, as we thought, which were lying rather thickly in the valley, rose over the moon, and advanced with steady steps, drawing a hard black edge across her face: she was half covered before we perceived that it was an eclipse*, and most curiously beautiful was the effect of the half-obscured light on the mountains: the villagers came out of their houses to observe the phenomenon, and seemed much alarmed by it. "On dit," said our dragoman, "que ces choses portent toujours les grands malheurs, et que le sang va couler tout de suite;" and, as if in sad confirmation of his words, before the eclipse was over we actually heard firing on the mountains opposite, and saw smoke hanging about in various spots — the villages on the other side of the El Metn had taken up the quarrel! The Druzes about us seemed very much excited, but as we went home we heard that the Bishop at Madrass had ordered the culprits to come to him on the following morning, and that he would surely induce them to make satisfactory amends to each other.

* The Honourable Roden Noel, son of the Earl of Gainsborough.

And early on Sunday morning the good Father did talk very earnestly to both. He desired his Christian son to apologise to the Druze whom he had beaten so unmercifully, which he promised to do; but he stipulated that the muleteer, as the first offender, should come to his house to fetch the apology; this the Druze stoutly refused. About 10 A.M. we were attracted to the window by the sound of loud and angry voices, and looking out we saw several Druzes collected on the roof of a house in the village, a few paces on our left, all shouting and gesticulating at once, and evidently restrained with great difficulty by some of the elders: they were all pointing and calling down the mountain side, where we saw, about a hundred yards below us, a no less eager crowd of Christians collected on a projecting knoll of ground on the path to Madrass, where, with their quick, eager movements, they looked just like a swarm of bees. We easily discerned similar efforts being made among them, by the elders of their party, at soothing and appeasing their excitement,—they seemed to have formed themselves into a ring, through which they were determined not to allow any of the more impetuous ones to break, or to rush up to attack the Druzes on the summit: when presently, up came the little party from Madrass with tidings of the conditions imposed by the Christian upon the apology he had agreed to make. The words were hastily shouted out to those above, and in another moment there came the report of a musket—a Druze had fired! and now, with a rush on both sides, the restraining elders were unheeded as the impetuous crowd swept by them—the Christians ran up the terraces from below, hiding behind the mulberry trees to fire up, the Druzes from above firing down in answer,—and though numbers failed of their aim, we saw several deliver its fatal message of death or torture: meanwhile there was a battle going on in the middle of the village, the Druzes from one end meeting the Christians from the other end,—but this we could not see. The ground was so steep, and the terraces stood so high one above another, that on the mountain side there could be no coming face to face,

* This eclipse, which was total, was not visible in England.

It was completely guerilla warfare — each one fighting for himself, without leaders or plan, picking out any enemy he could see, and taking aim from behind a mulberry tree or a bit of rock ; later on, a small party on each side met on the open road and the rocks about the fountain, and fought for some time vigorously in the little dell : we saw some fall, and then the rest escaped through the pine forest close at hand. All this time, high above the noise of the firing, there rose continually a horrible sound — who that has once heard it can forget how it thrilled through head and heart ! — the war-cry raised by the women on both sides, as standing on the housetops they watched the progress of the fight, urging on the men, hanging over the edge with eager gesticulations, or throwing up their arms wildly in the air, more like frenzied demons than human women ; sometimes there came from one or another a piercing wail over the wounded or fallen : while many others followed their husbands with pitchers of water on their shoulders, giving them drink ever and anon in the heat of the burning sun, standing beside them when they took aim, and every moment shrieking out the fierce shrill scream which excited every man to do his utmost in shedding blood. Three of these women were wounded.

The principal Druze houses were, as I have said, on the little craggy rock exactly above our house ; their rifles, therefore, (and nearly all of them had rifles) were not more than seven or eight yards from it. Of course their houses were one of the principal objects of attack ; so every moment the bullets passed over our roof, grating along the walls with that peculiar sharp whitzzz which it is far more agreeable to hear at a distance than within half a yard of one's ears ; sometimes they passed like hail across the windows, and the answering bullets from below as often hit the walls of the house as others fizzed up over our heads in the open corridor. The Emir and another man were wounded by stray shots in the little house next to ours, and in fact there was scarcely a yard of ground any where near us free from bullets. We had previously agreed with our English friends — there were two English gentlemen then in Beit Miry, — that we would read our Sunday service together; but now we earnestly hoped they would not expose themselves to the flying bullets in order to keep the engagement; but, afraid that we might need their protection, they never thought of breaking it, and they happily arrived at our house in safety and unhurt. Our dragoman wanted us to immure ourselves in a room lighted only by a door opening on to the corridor, but the excitement and interest of the battle was far too great for us to resist watching it from this open corridor or from the windows at all sides of the house: we were assured, however, that this fighting might go on for many days, certainly till night, and as we could do no good by watching them, we agreed to read our Sunday service as usual: I do not think that any of us will easily forget that hour of prayer, and with what unusual meaning the petition arose “from battle and murder, and from sudden death — Good Lord, deliver us,” or how we thought of the same prayers rising at the same moment in hundreds of quiet churches in England, while our little congregation of five or six persons were assembled here, with the bullets falling thick and fast around us, and the voice of the reader frequently drowned in the sharp click of the muskets, the strange ring of the rifle balls, and the shrill screams of the women! Fear, indeed, none of us had ever thought of, nor had we any cause for it; we knew well that our being English ensured our safety among the Druzes, and that their respect for us would not fail : a remarkable instance of which was afforded more than once during the battle, when one of us leaned out from a window, and a Druze close by stopped, even in the moment of taking aim, and, lowering his gun, made a salaam to the "Sitt;" and they called to our servants to know whether some buildings on our ground belonged to us or not,—of course we said they did, and no one entered them. There was a French family spending a few weeks in some miserable apartments under our house, whereby, happily for them, they were living under our flag, and that flag afforded them equal security and safety with ourselves. A number of Christian women, as well as our landlord and his family, rushed into our house when the battle began, the women bringing their gold ornaments, and took refuge in these lower rooms; — not one of them was touched.

About three o'clock the firing suddenly ceased — and the subsequent stillness seemed almost stunning after the tumult and noise : we learned that the Christians had exhausted their ammunition and therefore fled — the Druzes remaining masters of the field : and then came the saddest part of the day — several wounded and one dead Druze were carried past our house, borne on men's shoulders, bleeding and groaning, and the lamenting of the women was soon heard as they recognised their own beloved ones among the sufferers brought to their houses, — they flung their arms over their heads and sung a wild cry, half Druze war-cry and half like the Irish caoine. Druze reinforcements from other villages now arrived, and we saw some of the deserted Christian houses being sacked and the furniture burned : they said this was done only by the strangers. We opened the hall door, and went out on the steps to breathe more freely in the now still afternoon air, when a venerable-looking, white-bearded Druze, one of their chiefs, immediately came up and assured us, with the most expressive signs and words, that amongst them not only our persons but all our property also, was perfectly safe ;— he said that wherever our flag was unfurled everything would be secure, and added that it was already well known in the mountains: and they afterwards told one of the English gentlemen that they had for three days endeavoured to put off the war on account of the “sittah Ingleez” who were staying among them: this we heard also in other parts of the country afterwards.

The stillness and silence of the village in the afternoon was indeed a contrast to the horrors of the day: the Europeans profited by it in sending messages to each other, consulting what they should do: the Druzes were, of course, much elated, and as strangers came to join them from other villages we heard that this battle was to be only the precursor of many others, and that they fully hoped to exterminate the Christians throughout the mountains. The other Europeans determined to leave the place at once: one family indeed had already gone: for, in the very thickest of the fight, about mid-day, these good people had the folly to fly, passing right through the combatants, and of course putting themselves in a hundred times more danger from stray shots, than they would have incurred by remaining quietly in their house: their terror and confusion being too great to allow of a moment's thought or delay, they fled on foot in the burning sun, hatless and bonnetless, carrying their children in their arms, all the way down to Beyrout, a four hours' walk. On arriving in the town their alarm had so much increased at every step and filled their minds with horrible pictures, that they spread the intelligence that all the Europeans had been massacred and their houses sacked; so far from this being the case, we heard afterwards that every single thing from their own deserted house was carried down to them a day or two later, not one thing missing, even the lady's thimble and their provisions prepared for the day included! except, indeed, their grey mare, which they had left tied near the house, and which we saw, poor thing, killed soon after by some three or four stray shots.

I am afraid that the prejudices of some of my readers may be shocked at my confession that my sympathy involuntarily sided with the Druzes throughout the day: of course, in this particular instance they were in the wrong and the aggressors; but apart from the cause, the bearing of the Druze, speaking generally, is so much more akin to an English mind than that of the Christians, that one cannot well help such a feeling; the latter were quick and active, but the Druze has a fearlessness and nobility about him—a proud, steady step—a lofty head and eagle eye—a bold athletic form, and a free, open, but perfectly respectful manner, that makes one feel always at ease and safe with them. During the battle it was curious to mark the difference of the ingenious hiding and dodging of the Christian, and the daring boldness of the Druze—it reminded me continually of a battle between a cat and a blood-hound—if such a noble beast would condescend to do battle with a mere cat. The Christians of the mountains are well made, and have a soft, sleepy kind of beauty, set off by gay-coloured dresses: but if ever you see a noble form both of figure and face, full of self-respect and native dignity, and a neatly put on, clean, quiet-coloured dress, be sure he is a Druze, or a Metouaalee (the latter, however, have but poor dresses): the dresses of the Christians are more costly than that of the Druze, but the Druze is much the cleanest of the two: numerically, the Maronites far exceed the Druzes, — but the minority of the latter are more than compensated by their courage, coolness, and organization.

Mr. Noel now left us to see how things were going on in his own house, which he had given up to the shelter of very many women and children, with their little bundles of valuables and gold ornaments; and on going back he found his dragoman had brought in several of the wounded, whose sufferings they did their best to relieve:—that long night was a sad one, passed among the women and children, two of whom were wounded,—the little babies were crowing or sleeping in infantine content, while many of the women were wailing for the dead, amongst whom was the muleteer who had begun the quarrel, and whose young wife had been married but a month before. Mr. Noel came back to us at nightfall for linen rags and medicine—a Druze dodged him in the darkness with his rifle cocked, and was just stooping to take aim when he called out, “Howadji Ingleez! Ingleez!” upon hearing which the Druze started up and made amends by accompanying him to our door with many signs of respect, repeating “Ingleez taib, taib keteer!”

A thick fog came up with the night, and shrouded everything from view, but we sat in our corridor watching the moonlight shining in strange brightness down upon the white masses and folds of the fog below us, and listening rather anxiously for any distant firing, fearing lest the Druzes should think of pursuing the Christians in their flight: we heard nothing, however, until, about seven o'clock, the deep silence was broken by a horrible kind of sound — the Druzes were parading the village in a band, singing a war-song of triumph — very wild and simple was the air, and the voices sounded rich and sweet; but the meaning was too well expressed; and every note thrilled through one with a strange, sad horror, swelling loudly, and dying away softly, as they came to and fro: often I think I hear that song still.

The chaunt had scarcely ceased, when we heard, to our great surprise, drums beating, and the tramping of horses coming up the road: the firing of the battle had been heard in Beyrout; those who had fled had given the alarm, with all kinds of exaggeration, and the Pacha had, therefore, sent up a body of thirty cavalry to keep the peace; and at the same time, the various Consuls had each one sent up horses and mules, to bring down their respective countrymen, protected by their own janissaries. In a few hours, all the European families in the village, excepting ourselves, had quietly packed up and mounted, and before the sun had risen next morning, they were all comfortably arrived in their homes at Beyrout. The English Consul, however, had sent up no one.

We had brought several letters of introduction to the Consul, but during our long stay in the town he had never called, and we had had no communication beyond a civil note: in this time of danger and need, however, we fully believed and expected that assistance would be sent, not only to us, but also to the English gentlemen then in Beit Miry: so we sat listening for the arrival of more mules, &c., but nothing was heard, and it became a matter of serious consultation what we should do. The French gentleman, whose family occupied the rooms under us, very kindly sent up to say he could spare us three horses, if we liked to go down with them; but we had not the slightest idea of thus leaving our baggage behind us, having no fears of any kind for ourselves personally in remaining, while to leave our things at the mercy of strangers from other villages was not to be thought of: we knew that the Druzes had sent to summon their comrades from other mountains, and it was believed on both sides that a long and sanguinary war was only then commencing; and we began to feel that if we remained, we should have no freedom in the neighbourhood for walking, and, knowing nothing, alas, of surgery, which we deeply regretted, we could not be of any kind of use among them. A minor, but unpleasantly important consideration likewise influenced us: the Christians had carried off their cocks and hens, their gardens were trampled down, and it seemed very doubtful that we should get anything to eat: supplies from Beyrout were easily ordered, but, if fighting continued, it seemed unlikely that any muleteers would bring them to us; then our men-servants being all three Maronites, not one of them could go in safety even to the fountain to fetch water, though the cook, braver than the rest, volunteered to go, on condition that we let him carry the flag in his hand! So, all things considered, we came very reluctantly to the conclusion that we had better go somewhere else, and accordingly a note was despatched by one of the descending parties, to beg that mules and horses might be sent up for us.

We were not, however, uncared for: H.M.S. Tartarus had arrived some days before at Beyrout, and our friend, Captain Mansell, becoming alarmed for our safety, on hearing the terrific accounts carried down to the town, had gone himself to the Consulate to seek for assistance; the Consul, and Vice-Consul, the Secretary, and every one else was away, the Consulate was locked, and not a janissary to be found; — it was Sunday, and some hours were lost in searching for them, and then in getting horses and mules, after which he took upon himself the despatching of janissaries with the animals up the mountain. And as there are always more kind hearts in the world than one counts on, we had been remembered by another: a lady had sent out at daybreak to know if we had come down with the other Europeans in the night, and not hearing anything of us, and fearing that our Consul had not sent up assistance, she requested a gentleman belonging to her husband's office to ride up at once, and invite us to her house; we were grateful to this gentleman, who readily undertook a long ride in the burning heat, for persons in whom he had not the slightest interest; but we were more touched by the kind thoughtfulness of the lady who had sent him, to whom we were entirely strangers, and not even countrywomen: the life of Madame Broë is, however, devoted to acts of charity and kindness, and her excellent heart is ever intent upon succouring those in need: there are not a few of the poor and suffering in the town, and many a traveller struck down with fever in Beyrout, who have had occasion to bless her name.

In the meantime the Turkish Bey in command of the troop just arrived, sent three of his soldiers to our house for our protection, and though we were considerably more afraid of them than of the Druzes, it seemed wiser to accede to the wishes of our servants, and to let them mount guard in the corridor, where they smoked and eat cucumbers the whole night long, while we were packing up our things. We had calculated that the mules might reach us by 5 A. M., and we were accordingly ready to start at that hour, but many another wearily elapsed ere our packages were fastened on the mules, and it was nearly 2 P.M. before we set off. Our escort was a large one, made up of English janissaries and some French kawasses who had been left behind the night before, I believe for our protection: however, we saw no one from whom to be protected, and not a creature did we even meet on the road save a few miserable Christians, who had fled despoiled of everything. That evening, with the war cries and wailings of the battle still echoing in my ears, I sat long in the corridor of the hotel, watching the calm moonlight shining on the little village, now so far off, and our own deserted but beloved mountain home, and,—strange and striking contrast! looking at the “crimson and emerald rain” falling in showers of bright flakes from the rockets and fireworks of a splendid fête given by Count Bentivoglio, the French Consul, in honour of the Emperor’s birthday.

Early the next morning the two gentlemen we had left at Beit Miry arrived at the hôtel, driven down by the pangs of hunger! and in the course of the day we learned, on the best authority, “that one of us had been murdered in the battle, and that the other had escaped, with the maid, into the depths of the valley, where it was confidently expected, both would be immediately shot or starved to death!

The question now was, what were we to do with ourselves? travelling down to Jerusalem in August was not to be contemplated by any sane person, while the temperature of Damascus was much higher than that of Beyrout, where we found the heat so intolerably oppressive that we determined at once to go up as high as we could into the mountains; it was not likely that there would be any disturbance in the northern district about the Cedars, unless the war became quite general, when, of course, the Metouaalees would join in it, but before this could take place we should be able to descend to Tripoli, or to cross the Bekâa to Damascus. Some of our friends had settled to go to the Cedars for some time, and as H.M.S Tartarus was going to Tripoli, the Captain kindly invited us all to go in her that far, an offer which we were very glad to accept.

In the meantime a hollow peace was, after a few days, patched up between Druze and Maronite,—“till the next cocoons are gathered,” we heard said on both sides, and too true, alas! it turned out to be. A good many small circumstances came out—the Governor of Beyrout had strictly forbidden the Christians from purchasing arms in the Bazaars, but Druzes were allowed to purchase them freely, and they did so, boasting at the same time openly in the streets of how many they had killed, and how completely they hoped to exterminate the Christians if the war continued; but these spokesmen were, I believe, the young bloods and boasting boys. From all we learned at this time and afterwards it was quite evident that the chief Druzes did not desire war; they were invited, pushed into it,—they are not men to brook even a small injury, and they resented it accordingly, but they would be men of peace if they were let alone.

It was not only in Beyrout, where it is more difficult than in most other places to separate gossip and canards from truth and facts, that we learned how completely the Druzes were favoured by the Government; the unfortunate Christians were seized, imprisoned, fined, when they attempted to obtain arms for themselves, while, as I have said, the Druzes notoriously purchased largely; the Christian mountaineers wherever we went were provided only with common old muskets—while the Druzes had rifles in great numbers, and many of their Sheikhs had revolvers—only a very few of the Christians, and those only Emirs, had ever seen any of the latter : even the Emir of Beit Miry, but three hours from so large a European town as Beyrout, was astonished out of all Arab gravity at a silver mounted six-barrelled revolver, with which I was one day practising at a mark on one of the trees near his house. He implored me with clasped hands to wait while he fetched a beautiful little boy, his son and heir, to see the sight, and then when I had re-fired it for his edification he solemnly applauded his little son's question, as to whether the weapon came from Sheitân ? I am convinced that the Emir himself believed that Satan reloaded it for me ad infinitum.

It is an unquestionable fact that the Turks do, and have always encouraged the Druzes against the Christians : they hate both equally : but their object is plain,—the Druzes are exceedingly warlike and dexterous in fighting,—the Christians are weak in war but strong in numbers—and they therefore try to make use of the Druzes to exterminate the Christians—and when they have done the hard work for them they will come in with a strong hand and get the small body of Druzes into their power. I believe that at least some of the Druzes understand their game perfectly, and see through it ; they are quite willing to be assisted into getting rid of their hereditary enemies, whom the Turks are always representing as the authors of all ill against them, and they think they will take care of themselves afterwards : it will not be a very easy thing to exterminate the Druzes.

The horrors of the following spring completely confirmed all these reports : the Druzes paraded the streets of Beyrout with the Mooslims, the one boasting of the dogs of Christians they had slain, their boon companions applauding the deeds: it was reported by a gentleman who has lived long in the country that he had himself seen Mooslims ornamenting with flowers the muskets and knives of those who had killed the greatest numbers. Wherever the most horrible of the massacres and butcheries were perpetrated, the Turks edged on and encouraged the deed: at Deir el Kamar the Mutselim stood by while the Druzes disarmed the Christians and invited the unfortunate 530 Christians into the Seraï, of which they afterwards opened the gates when the Druzes came in to slaughter them! at Hasbeiya the Turkish Colonel collected the Christians into the Seraï and there disarmed them: he himself admitted the Druzes in to kill the 700 unarmed men, besides the unhappy women, while his soldiers stood by looking on at the battue! These are but two out of numberless other cases; at Damascus the Muschir did everything to invite the Druzes into the town — there were 5000 of them armed within the walls on the day before the massacre—and while they did the horrid work, the Turkish soldiers and Kurds carried off the plunder, the Muschir sitting at home in the Seraï with the doors closed against every one.

On the very best authority the fact has been made clear that, in 1860, the Christians commenced hostilities: the Druze Sheikhs endeavoured by every means in their power to preserve peace, in all probability because they felt their own weakness against the overwhelming numbers of their enemies in the Lebanon: when Kur-schid Pacha, compelled by the Consuls to interfere, desired the Christian Emirs to send home the fighting men then assembled, they answered that they were confident of beating the Druzes, and would beat the soldiers also if they interfered to prevent them, knowing very well that the soldiers would do no such thing. So confident were the Christians, that they were careless—while the Druzes, fearful of defeat unless joined by their brethren of the Haurân, made use of all their strength, and improved every advantage they could gain. The Christians were everywhere beaten, and the Druzes were so much elated at their almost unexpected victories, that they pursued the Christians and committed barbarous atrocities such as nothing can justify; although one may make much excuse for them, remembering their hereditary hatreds, and that the Christians, having sought to exterminate them, they naturally desired retaliation and revenge: besides it is absurd to judge them by the standard of a Christian or an educated people. At Hhaïffa and many other places the Christians committed horrible brutalities, about which nothing has been said; and while deploring the misdeeds of the wild Druze of the mountains it would be as well to remember the acts not so very long since of many an army of drilled and disciplined soldiery belonging to the most Christian countries of Europe, civilized Europe, and, not to speak of the atrocities of Austrian, Prussian, Italian, worst of all of French soldiers, to look back at some of our own in the unspeakable horrors that have taken place in Ireland, Scotland, and fair England! Of course the Druze, in giving loose to his passion is very guilty, but he is ignorant and unenlightened:—are we, when our passions are excited, pious and progressive though we be, much better? or were the Irish in 1641 or in 1798 one whit less sanguinary or atrocious in their conduct than the Druze?

CHAP. XII.

LEBANON POLITICS.

WE were a party of seventeen guests on board H.M.S. Tartarus, and the vessel was so crowded that we were glad to find ourselves in our quiet tents, on the pleasant shore of Tripoli, after twelve hours at sea; we spent the next day, while the horses rested from their journey up from Beyrout, re-visiting the town and mountains. Our tents were pitched in a garden on the sea-shore, close to the Castle of Raymond of Toulouse, and we rode thence by the bank of the Kadisha to the fine ravine behind the town, and through the picturesque streets, till it was time to go home and go to bed, as we were to be up and dressed before 3 A.M.; and so we were, but we did not start till past four, when the sun had risen. We had a very lovely ride of six hours and a half, over a wide undulating plateau with fertile fields, fresh, pleasant woods and purling streams, till the ascent, by a steep and rugged path, to a little chapel perched on the side of a very narrow grand gorge, where we rested for an hour or two; some very pretty, smiling girls insisted on our admiring the valley of which they seemed quite fondly proud, and the lovely views of Tripoli, with her rocks and headlands stretching out into the blue sea: they would also make us look at the chapel and their own cottage, the windows of both of which were filled up with human skulls, looking most dismal — and they showed us the curved iron bar hung in a tree, on which a hammer struck the call which served for a church bell. Then came a tremendous ascent,—disagreeable enough to mount, but nowhere dangerous—zig-zagging up between two high mountains of curiously contorted strata, clothed with the white cypress, with which we were now to become daily familiar—now and then a pine, or a walnut, or a pomegranate, and every here and there tiny gardens perched on narrow ledges, bearing potatoes or cotton, or a few vines. Then, turning suddenly away from a strange peak, came Jebel Arneto, which looked as if it had been chopped off sideways, and meeting the upper streamlet of the Kadisha again bubbling by, we crossed the watershed and followed the brow of the mountain to the village of Eh'den, a very large village nearly hidden in groves of huge walnut trees. The people crowded round us with equally warm and troublesome salutations and welcomes, as we made our way through them in order to choose a delightful camping-ground under some splendid walnut trees, which, by-the-bye, Miss Martineau calls “some of the finest trees in the world.” As there was a good bit of ground, all the tents were set up in the same place, our three grouped round one enormous tree, with a mountain torrent tumbling and rushing down between them. The other tents were at some little distance, and afterwards when another traveller came up from Tripoli he chose the same ground, retiring to the back; nothing could be more picturesque than the whole group, with our flag in the front, hoisted in a mulberry tree, and the six or eight horses and twelve mules picketed beneath the trees with their gay coloured trappings and attendants, while round the kitchen tents there would always be half a dozen gossiping villagers dressed in the brightest coloured dresses imaginable. The people of Eh'den are remarkably handsome, both men and women, and the children lovely: the women wear a singular headdress under their veils, made of silver, in the shape of the crown of a bonnet—sometimes with a kind of crescent-shaped horn.

This camping-ground was in fact on a wide terrace or plateau, running the length of the valley along the side of the mountain, which rose almost perpendicularly like a wall immediately behind us, with barely slope enough for the white cedars to grow in a feathery veil nearly to the summit. On the opposite side of the valley the mountain was still more richly clothed with woods, gardens, and villages, while between the two, the gorge—which is called Wady el Kadisha—sunk suddenly down in a deep tremendous ravine, very narrow and very romantic, winding away westwards to the sea, which we saw at the extreme right; while the horizon, from the great height at which we were placed, was apparently some way up the sky. To the left the valley was closed by an amphitheatre of perfectly barren mountains, sloping down in bare terraces*; this was part of the great Makh'mel: on one side, at about half a mile from our tents, a copious spring gushed from the rock, bosomed in a nook of thick woods, dividing itself at once into two streams, one of which flowed down the gorge to the sea, and the other, passing just above our camp, ran down by the Pass we had mounted, into the river Kadisha.

We had intended to have gone on to the Cedars on the following day, and we always did intend to go on "to-morrow;" but the spot was so very beautiful, and our tents so agreeably placed, and the air so fresh and cool and pleasant, that we had been there nearly a month before we really made up our minds to leave it. We were, in fact, much in need of rest and quiet such as we found here: the horrors of war and bloodshed had been witnessed, but, in the excitement of the moment, by no means fully felt; in Beyrout there was still the daily and hourly anxiety for news from the surrounding villages, and the constant listening to the sorrowful tales of the unhappy, burnt-out villagers who came to see our servants and to reclaim the small articles of their property we had taken charge of; then came the new journey,—and it was only among the stern and lofty mountains, and the cool, green groves of Eh'den, that we began to recover our usual calm enjoyment of Nature. The peasants of Syria declare that it is unhealthy to sleep under walnut trees, and the dragomans always advise one not to do so; but the air of Eh'den is a remedy against everything—though we all fancied there was some truth in the idea. We were now 4750 feet above the sea, and though the sun was excessively powerful by day, and the tents uninhabitable where they were unshaded, we had plenty of cool resting-places beneath the trees, scarcely any mosquitos, and such cold nights that we needed all the shawls and cloaks we possessed, to keep comfortably warm; nevertheless we managed to be scrambling up the mountain by five o'clock most mornings, and thought ourselves well repaid each day by the sublimely glorious sight of the sunlight breaking over the mountain, darting down into the gorge, and striding with lightning steps over the valley, bringing out a thousand brilliant colours which belong only to the gorgeous hues of Aurora, veiled and mystified by the blue haze and swansdown mists of morning—I could have watched that sunrise every day for years and never tired of its glorious grandeur. There was only one thing better, and this was the sunset: every day it was the same, and every day it seemed to take one's breath away with its sublime beauty, as something too lovely and too glorious to be really of this earth; then the gorge would fill up with haze as blue as the sea, and the walnut groves would turn into masses of shining aventurine gold, and the mountains, yellow and bare by day, would flush over with a tender, transparent crimson glow melting into the golden light,—so delicate, so lovely, and yet so sublimely grand, that no words can describe it, and no pencil imitate its hues.

* On one of these terraces there stands a single Cedar tree, not very large, but the only true Cedar we saw in the Lebanon besides the famous group in "Solomon's garden."

Eh'den is said to be one of the oldest villages in Syria, and is thought by some people to be the "Eden in Thelassar"* mentioned in Isaiah xxxvii. 12; the name is Syriac, and this language was spoken there till lately. It is a fine flourishing village, containing an active and industrious population, hardy and brave; the parish priest told us the boys were very intelligent and quick at learning, but in the Lebanon no girls ever go to school or are taught anything,—even the nuns only learn reading enough to enable them to chant the office in church. M. Regace, the Lazariste priest here, has two or three assistants in his mission, a large school in Eh'den, and one in every village in the valley. The people of Eh'den are well to do in the world—they eat meat always twice a week, and there are really no poor, because those who are richer help the poorer, lending money at a good interest which the peasant repays by the proceeds of his land—he forfeits his property after some time if he fails to pay, but we were told that this seldom or never happens. The noble walnut trees are many of them five hundred years old—they are found named, their position described, and the quantity of their fruit recorded in parchments of upwards of three hundred years old, in the possession of the Emir and other persons;—some of the trees have passed through the hands of as many as fifty families; the ownership of many of them is divided among perhaps a dozen different families, who collect under the branches, as we saw them doing at the gathering time, and divide between them the fruit that falls. One of the oldest families of Syrian noblesse, the Dah'reer, once inhabited a village filling up the now barren head of the gorge, but in a Metoualee war the village was burnt,—the family fled to Tripoli, and the soil has lain untouched ever since. This Eh'den, so famous for its vines and luscious grapes, and its flowers, and its summer beauty, is utterly uninhabited in the winter: it is so cold and so long enveloped in snow, that all the people, headed by the Sheikh, descend to another village near Tripoli, where they live till the smiles of spring call them back to their vineyards; only the poor monks remain behind, and sometimes a peasant journeys up through the snow once or twice in the winter to carry them some little luxury to add to their store of bread, lentils, and wine.

* Both Schwartz and Jonathan the Targumist consider Thelassar to mean El Ashur, the mountainous part of Assyria, or the country round Adiabéné.

Eh'den produces excellent potatoes, which are carried down to Tripoli and sent to Beyrout, for the natives never taste them, not having an idea how to cook them; nor do they care to learn, as the Arab eats all his vegetable food, except bread and lentils, raw; and they are disinclined to eat or to do anything but what their fathers ate or did before them.

It was a pleasure to us to make acquaintance with the Sheikh, or Emir,—the “pretty boy” mentioned by Lord Lindsay, now a man in the prime of life; he was the second son, but as his talents and intelligence were superior to those of the eldest son, his father gave him a better education, and associated him with himself in the business part of his position, and brought him forward to the Turkish authorities, so as to insure his being his successor; he speaks Italian and French well, has easy, pleasant manners, and is both lively and intelligent, as well as quiet and agreeable in conversation,—in person he is tall, well-made, and very fair. His name is Yussoof,—he is (of course) a naturalised French subject, and the Turks have made him a Bey: he has never been much further from home than Beyrout, nor does he seem inclined to go; he says his duty lies in his government, which extends to several villages, and he will not leave it for a day; but his ideas are anything but bornées by the mountains of his native land—he showed himself thoroughly acquainted with European politics, and knew the names and characteristics of some of our Cabinet ministers; he is, in short, much too well educated for his personal happiness, for, except M. Regace, he has no real companion save a chance traveller, and he feels it impossible to marry among the uneducated, illiterate women of his own villages. He came to see us as soon as we arrived, bringing baskets of grapes and fresh bread, according to the hospitable custom of the village,—the only place, by the bye, where we experienced anything of the kind, for though of course we afterwards made a present to the bearer, the Sheikh begged us to understand that they only performed their duty to the stranger, whom they consider themselves bound to maintain till his baggage arrives.

We returned his visit on the following day; he came down to the courtyard of his house to receive us, surrounded by some seven or eight persons, and conducted us upstairs into a large, though low arched room, with stone mullioned windows — the walls and floor of stones of two colours in patterns — and furnished with handsome Tripoli carpets and divans. His servants presented eau sucrée, then arrack, candied sweetmeats, and lastly coffee; after which came nargilehs for those that liked them. Of course we spoke of the war — of the patching up of which he had not then heard any satisfactory intelligence; he said one must not think the war in any way depended upon a personal quarrel anywhere — that was only the opening note on which others would inevitably follow; and he repeated most emphatically that the war really depended much more upon what was going on in the principal countries of the civilised world than on anything local; that the real fact was, that, had the news of the Peace of Villafranca not been thoroughly spread through the Lebanon, the war would have been taken up on all sides, and become fierce and general, and that it was only because some were not aware of the Peace that it broke out at all — else this one would only have begun and ended a muleteer's quarrel. The Emir said also that unquestionably, did England and France go to war with each other to-morrow, or the attention of Europe be thoroughly occupied with some other war, the whole Lebanon would burst into a flame instantly, and not only the mountains but the whole of Syria would be utterly unsafe for Christians and Europeans, as, if anything really serious had once commenced, all the Mooslims would undoubtedly join in the fight at once, while the Turkish authorities would try to exterminate all the Christians and Europeans in the country. He dwelt much upon the fact of how much the Turkish Government secretly encourage the Druzes, hoping to use them as tools to get rid of the native Emirs for them, after which the Lebanon would be more easy of access; but the Sheikh said confidently their mountain fastnesses would protect the Christians even after their leaders had fallen. He told us that during the late war between France and Austria, the Turks invited all the Druze and Metoualee chiefs to a secret conference in Beyrout to which not a single Christian was invited; he regretted much the recall of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, believing that no one else could prevent such things and penetrate the secret, underhand doings of the Turks; and he lamented loudly and bitterly that the famous Hatti-Humayoun had ever been obtained, since it was worse to have it so utterly unused and uncarried out than never to have had it granted, and he added that its very fulness of compliance ought to have prevented the Christian Powers from being deceived into putting any faith in it, as nothing could possibly induce the Turkish Government really to fulfil anything of the kind; the Christians have only been worse off ever since. Now, when seeking justice, they are always answered, "You have got your Hatti-Humayoun; what more can you want?"—although it be but waste paper, serving but to render the Mooslims more jealous and irritated than ever. We afterwards heard, both at Damascus and Jerusalem, exactly the same complaint made, in almost the same words as those used by the Emir, of the impossibility of getting any justice in the Turkish tribunals since the Hatti-Humayoun; however, no one does or ever did expect to find justice in a Turkish Court—well do they exemplify the Arab description of the Turkish Government generally, that “The Sultan goes to hunt gazelles on a lame ass,” meaning thereby to express not merely its insufficiency, but its intentional inefficiency.

The opinions of the Sheikh Yussoof at least deserve the attention due to a man who, although naturally a partisan, is a liberal-minded, enlightened person, and who is, except the Bishops, the chief man of influence, and the only leader of the Maronites. His conversation wound up that day with the prophecy, only too sadly fulfilled, that this would be the last summer of peace in the Lebanon for many a day.

Sheikh Yussoof told us many legends of the Druzes, currently believed among the Maronites — of how they worship the figure of a calf made in gold or silver, and how they have various logs of wood concealed in their Khulwehs, each one named after the God of the Jews, Christians, &c.; these they take out on certain occasions and beat, saying that if any of the gods were true and real, they would save or avenge their types from these drubbings. But when the sacred manuscripts of the Hasbeiya Druzes were scattered abroad, and an explanation of much of their abstruse and speculative creed thus obtained, nothing of an idolatrous nature was found in them: had they really worshipped idols, something must have appeared of it in these books: and since then a key to various mysterious signs, not understood by all even of the initiated, has fallen into the hands of Dr. Vandyke, the learned missionary at Beyrout, but nothing of idol worship appeared connected with them.

Sheikh Yussoof thinks that the Druzes do not believe in the present existence of God; they say that in the beginning He created the world and all things in it — earth, air, sea—and then descended from heaven upon it; but the great wind, one of these created things, though small in the beginning, had increased meanwhile to great power and strength, and, catching the Almighty as He was reascending, killed Him, so that since that time there has been no God, and creation has been left to its own devices.

Hakim, the founder of the Druze creed, taught, that on the destruction or death of God, His soul became incarnate in some other body—afterwards in his (Hakim's) own body: that God in the beginning created a certain number of souls, which number has always and will always exist—neither increasing nor diminishing—as, if one person dies, the soul passes into another about to be born, and thus the original number always continues somewhere on the earth, to be collected and restored together at the end of the world. At that time the Druzes alone will be happy and blessed—the Christians will be punished for their heresies and contempt of the Druzes, by having two cantars of lead hung round their necks—the Mooslims will have two rotls, and the Jews two ounces, to carry in this uncomfortable manner. They always favour the Jews above all other people—I know not why. Much of their love for the English, at least in the present day, is said to arise from the respect and influence acquired by Mr. Wood, the late Consul at Damascus, among them; and then, seeing that the English are neither Maronites nor Mooslims, they imagine they must be in some sort Druzes.

More interesting were the stories the Sheikh told us of the renowned Emir Beschir, whose ancestors became Maronites many generations ago; he spoke much of his greatness, of his unfailing integrity and uprightness—of his being enlightened so much beyond his age and position, and of how much he managed to effect against all difficulties; but he spoke also of the cruelty and revengefulness which tarnished his greatness, and was so strong a passion in him as sometimes to overbalance his high sense of justice, entailing the most horrible results.

Nothing earthly can persuade the Arabs that the Sultan is not the supreme governor of the world: nor make them believe that his armies can be defeated: or that, if they were, it would make any difference in his position as Sultan over all nations: for instance, the common people in the Lebanon firmly believe that the Queen of England sends some one of her nobles every year to kneel before the Sultan, with clasped hands and many prostrations, to beg from him the favour of being allowed to continue governing her country for another year; and they speak of it as an immense grace and kindness of the Sultan that he receives an envoy instead of herself in person, waiving that duty on her part, because she is a woman, and has children to attend to! They also believe that the Sultan kindly exempted England from paying tribute to him during the time of the Crimean war, because we brought our soldiers to assist his own against his rebellious subjects, — an honour for our armies for which the ambassador had besought the Sultan on bended knees.

We often heard described the immense excitement of the Mooslims all over the country at the time of the horrible massacre at Jeddah; how they exulted, crowed over the Christians, and kept assuring them that the time was soon coming for extirpating Christians throughout the Turkish dominions: and then, when the news of the bombardment of Jeddah by the English had arrived, how crestfallen the Turks looked, and how the Druzes went about saying, "Wonderful is the power of the English! great are the English! we too are English!"

Some days after we reached Eh'den, the Sheikh invited us to dinner, sending his nephew and five of his head servants to conduct us in state to his house, where he came down, as usual, to the courtyard to receive us; as soon as we were seated in the salon, a silver basin and ewer were brought, with embroidered towels, and water was poured over our hands by an attendant kneeling on one knee. When this had been performed for each of us, another attendant brought a silver incense-burner, over the perfumed smoke of which each guest bent for a few seconds, while another servant threw drops of orange-flower water over one's head and hands. Then came trays of apricots and orange candy, arrack and coffee, and after about an hour we went to dinner, which was served à l'Européenne, though the dishes were entirely Arab. The table was set out with flowers and fruit, and the dinner, which was handed round without being placed on the table, consisted of twelve courses of meat, prefaced by a thick vegetable soup,—stewed meats, boiled meats and minced meats, vegetables stuffed with meats, and meat stuffed with vegetables, two or three different pilafs of rice differently flavoured, and then two sweet dishes—one of square pieces of solidified cream (which, I am convinced, is the same as the "cream tarts" so often celebrated in "Arabian Nights"); the other of the favourite Arab bakhalaweh, a very light but rich pastry made with honey and almonds. These were followed by quantities of fruit, fresh and dried; besides many varieties of excellent Lebanon wine. We had coffee in the salon; and a band of servants lighted us home with torches and lanterns.

In return we invited the Emir and the French Consul at Tripoli, M. Blanche, to dine with us the last day of our stay at Eh'den; there were some other travellers there at the time, and we made a party of seven persons. M. Regace sent us a basket full of flowers, with which our tent was gaily ornamented; and our Arab cook actually managed to give them the same number of courses à la Française as the Emir had given us à l'Arabe: but our dinner ended with real English plum-pudding besides, and excellent peach cream-ice, made by one of the dragomans, and champagne. It is wonderful what skilful cooks these Arabs are, and how great a variety of dishes they make out of so few materials; their cuisine, too, being only a pan of charcoal in the open air.

M. Blanche, a savant, and a lover of the beautiful Lebanon, with the geography and natural history of which he is thoroughly acquainted, advised us to visit the old Convent of Mar Antoun; so one morning we started on horseback at an early hour, for it was to be a long excursion. Our route lay along the Tripoli road till we came to Jebel Arneto, where we turned off to the left and commenced descending the side of the valley, all bright and gay with vineyards, fruit gardens, and flowers—with the blue sea in the vista beyond—till the valley narrowed to a lofty gorge, up which we turned: it was closed by a huge rock, through which an open arch was cut, bearing a large white cross,—here began the Convent territory. Through this arch the view was magnificent, the mountains of the winding ravine crossing each other at every step, with steep and generally inaccessible sides, covered with woods of low prickly oak and thorn, with juniper and white cypress; studded with caverns, and crowned with crosses. Perched on the edge of one projecting crest, stood the Convent, se cramponnant against the rock, and seeming to overhang the chasm below. The monks ushered us to a divân under a vine-covered trellis, close to a tiny chapel cut in the rock, the only part of the Convent open to the unhallowed feet of women, numbers of whom come here in pilgrimage to obtain the miraculous cures for which the spot is famous. The Convent, which is the largest in the Lebanon, containing one hundred and thirty monks, has a grand façade of arches built up against the mountain side; the large halls and corridors are chiefly excavated in the rock, and some exterior buildings seemed to be well and ornamentally constructed; but only the gentlemen of our party were suffered to enter them, except, indeed, the enormous natural cavern, wherein unhappy maniacs are confined!—fortunately no one was there at the time: the wretched patients are chained to the rock, and left there in utter darkness; if they show signs of improvement, the chain is knotted to a board; when they can undo the knot for themselves, they are supposed to be fit to return into the world;—but I should think few of those poor creatures can ever come sane out of that dreadful place. It is a fine cavern, with stalactites forming within. On our return to the Pilgrim's resting-place, the monks sprinkled us with orange-flower water, and gave us a luncheon of delicious honey, grapes and figs, and two salads, one of parsley, the other of raw tomatoes. We regretted that we, ladies, might not see the printing-press, where many monks are busily employed each day; all we saw of their occupations were some three or four spinning goat's hair in one out-building, while in another it was woven by hand into coarse cloth or carpets. The good fathers gave us a friendly farewell ere we commenced our ascent of the far side of the gorge—an ascent fitter for goats than horses; but very beautiful was the view looking back on the Convent, and on all the various colours and forms in the valley below. At the top we were rejoined by one of our party who had scrambled on foot up to one of the numerous caverns to visit an old Hermit, much revered for his saintly character; he, and two others, had once been monks in Mar Antoun, but, finding that place too comfortable for their souls' welfare, they had, many years ago, retired into the solitude of separate caverns, their food consisting only of raw herbs and rancid oil, brought at long intervals up to the caves. The old man said that his only occupation was prayer, and that he endeavoured to entertain no thought in his mind but of God. He bestowed his blessing twice on his visitor with much unction, besides being very unctuous himself, placing one hand on his visitor's chest and the other on his back, so as to insure the blessing penetrating him through and through: the only thing in the cavern, besides himself and his goulleh of water, was a copy of one of Liguori's books translated into Arabic.

We then proceeded along the valley through the beautiful village, full of fruit and flower gardens, of Forsaab, opposite to Eh'den, each succeeding view being more lovely than the one before; and crossing round the head of the valley, by the picturesque mill and under the walnuts and willows which overhung the stream, we scrambled up the other side, and reached our tents just as the afternoon mist—a very common visitor—filled the valley. Every one who goes to Eh'den should take this excursion, which occupies about seven or eight hours. The thermometer in our tent marked 45° that morning at 6 o'clock, but the heat in the midday hours was very great.

One of our favourite walks was to a small but very ancient convent, Mar Serkis (St. Sergius)—quite at the head of the valley, by the Source, nestled into a nook in a wild little gorge of its own; the kind-hearted old monks always appeared quietly contented and happy among themselves; the want of comforts seeming atoned for in their minds by the fine view from their windows; they were very full of a new church they were building above the convent, but the one underneath it, said to be upwards of 500 years old, was more interesting to us; it is almost entirely excavated in the rock, and is entered by a rock-hewn winding staircase; it is very venerable-looking and impressive, with its two or three sombre lamps shining dimly in the utter darkness, and a few Arabic prayers written in the Syriac character for its sole ornament. The Source was always a favourite haunt of ours—its ice-cold waters gushing in full volume at once from the rock, under a pomegranate and some fine walnut trees—on the one side tumbling rapidly down into a delightful little dark dell shaded over with white poplars and weeping willows, where it was immediately hushed into complete silence, like a child silenced in the midst of its glee, not uttering a murmur till another “fount’s young waters” had crept from under a rock to meet it; then they both went whispering and babbling and laughing quietly together, over the rough way, till they came to the old mill, whence their course was a rapid and bounding one all the way to the sea. On the other side it glided into the white-cypress wood, and along a half natural, half artificial channel on the mountain side through the village, and down the pass, till it rushed out, the full-grown Kadîsha, under the walls of the Castle of Raymond of Toulouse at Tripoli.

THE BROOK AT EH'DEN.

From the blackness of the cavern deep Where jealous rocks my sources keep,
 Where the phantoms dark
 Who have given me birth
 All my destiny mark
 From the womb of earth,

I come—from under the rugged roots
 Of the ancient walnut tree,
Just where the tender pomegranate shoots
 Throw scarlet buds on me :

Then by the monastery old
 Where sunbeams never rest
Till all the west, with liquid gold
 And crimson splendour drest,

Flings back one glorious rosy ray
 To the lonely heart in the rock-cut cell,
Whose only joy in the silent day
 Is the faintly-sounding sweet prayer-bell :

Then I flow beneath the Cypress' shade
 On the mountain's rocky steep,
Where the goats browse close to the shepherd maid
 In the bosky thickets deep :

And I babble under the bright, bright green
 Where the vine a wild wreath weaves,
And I mark how the sunlight laughs between
 All the happy graceful leaves :

And my pebbles shine with lustrous glow
 Where my waters fain would stay ;
For a smile of Childhood's bliss, I know,
 Is there thrown across my way.

Then the Night has darkened down, before
I have reached the trembling stones,
Where I love to feel your steps pass o'er
And to hear your sweet, low tones,—

So I pause—and lo' the Moon's soft rays,
All in brightest flakes of silvery sheen,
In a tender glory o'er me plays
Like the glow of Angels' eyes, I ween,—

And my lowest drops leap up to meet
The radiance of her glance,
And my heart is full of joy, as sweet
As the fire-flies bright dance :

And I sometimes think, some tiny stars,
Dwelling just without the heavenly choir,
Whose fullest splendour some earth-stain mars
But whose eyes shine bright with holy fire,
Have come down my little wave to kiss,
On my breast their golden gifts to strew,
And my path to brighten with hours of bliss
Like the shining paths the stars pursue :

No, not for me this radiant lot :
They pass along their glorious way
Though "resting not, yet hastening not,"
They know no change, they fear no stay,—
I hasten on, and sudden slip
From under the lovely silvery flakes,
And their sweet bright light my breast forsakes
As shades of blackest darkness dip
Cold hands within my stream.
All sorrowful and mute I go,
Where village men pass to and fro,
And lights upon me beam ;
They use me, but they heed me not,
Nor list my plaintive murmuring—
The little songs all whispering
I sing to ease my lonely lot.

But courage ! 'neath the morning sky
I bravely leap from rock to rock,
With steady course increasingly
I triumph over every shock—

On, on with earnest strength I go
To that vast end that comes, I know;
And oft when Sunlight's fiercest beam
Beats scorching on my limped stream,
Some gentle shadowing tree
Bends lovingly o'er me,
Cooling my heated wave
As I the old roots lave —

Some thirsty bank drinks up my dew
And decks herself with flow'rets gay,
Then, mirrored in still tenderer hue,
The flowery portraits I repay.

Now, ere this work of mine is done
And I have earned my long, long rest —
Ere that great Sea hath laid me on Her grand, eternal, heaving breast, Beneath her deep, dark folds of blue —
I will look back, — not wasted all My life — from those whose simple wants and few
I fed within the Convent wall —

From the shade I cooled in morning hours
Within your own dear Cypress bowers, —
From the bright green vines whose sweet fruit drew Rich juices from my freshest dew, —

From the gifts I freely spent
As passing by the noisy din
Of human care, and wrath, and sin,
All earnest in my work I went, —

From these — though lonely, though forlorn
I wander on — yet, as I go,
Sweet blessings all my breast adorn,
Through all my waters flow.

These all my joy, till — gliding on
O wondrous Sea, I shall behold thee:
Thy mighty arms, whose home I've won,
In one grand smile of Death will fold me!

Then mute will be my little song,
(Sweet whisperings which to brooks belong) —

For then my voice, in anthems loud,
Will swell the Hallelujahs proud
Of Deep who calls to other Deep,
The Lord's high Name with praise to keep :

My voice, through mighty waves, e'en mine
The Lord Himself will heed :
Oh flow, flow on, my stream, with speed
To meet that Love divine !

CHAP. XIII.

SOLOMON'S FRIENDS AND SOLOMON'S WORK.

AT last, after bidding adieu to the Emir, we left our pretty encampment, and the merry village with its handsome, gaily-dressed people; it was midday when we started, and we had a ride of two and a half hours to reach the Cedars, along a bare, barren road, crossing the low pass between the valley of Mar Antoun and that of Khanobîn; hill after hill of rock without the faintest trace of verdure, till we arrived at the brink of an immense chasm, and, looking over the edge, we beheld the village of Bscherreh hanging on the rocky side of the ravine, embedded in wood and garden; just above the village the magnificent gorge closes round sharply, holding in its curve most weird-looking and fantastic rocks, and the beautiful Falls of the Kadîsha, which tumble down in masses of white foam to the gardens at the bottom,—on the other side of the ravine the village of Hasroun lies on a shelf of verdure and luxuriance. We turned away from this beautiful view, back to the hard, yellow, barren mountains on which the sunshine was pouring in fierce and pitiless rays,—when, in five minutes more, a general shout came from the muleteers, and the saïs beside me called out “Shoof! shoof! ya sitt! el Arz, el Arz!”* and I saw in the centre of an immense plateau, lying in the very bosom of the giant mountain which closes round three sides of it, a single black patch, so black and dark, I scarcely believed that this could be the Cedars of Lebanon! We rode on quickly, and forgot all fatigue and heat and everything else directly we were under their delicious shade, half an hour after our first view; it is difficult to describe the first feeling there,—your head must ache with the scorching heat, your eyes burn with the unshaded barrenness of the last few hours—you must feel the soothing coolness of the shade stealing through your heated veins, you must smell the powerful and refreshing fragrance of the Cedars, and see the venerable forms around you, before you can understand that beauty and delight which there sink into your very soul; it is like passing from the noisy din and world-weariness of some great city's market-place into the silent aisles of a vast Cathedral,—only that here the solitude is more complete, the columns and arches are of Nature's raising, and the holy hymns are sung by sweet birds twittering and trilling from tree to tree, while all in the fiery heat of the Bekâa, the scorched sands of the Desert, and the arid mountains of Judea, how often one's mind harked back to the cool, green shades of the Cedars, and one began to understand the glowing description of the Beloved whose eyes are like pools of water, and whose “countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars.” (Cant. v. 15.)

* “Look, look, oh lady! the Cedars, the Cedars!”

“the forest leaves seem stirred with prayer;”

It was difficult to choose the prettiest among so many pretty spots for our tents, but we finally fixed them close to the little chapel in the centre of the grove, from whence we had a view of the sea: the chapel is but a square construction of roughly hewn stones, four young cedar trunks forming the support inside: the altar was hung with pink chintz and ornamented with a cheap French print of the Madonna della Seggiola; every morning at six o'clock an old Maronite priest came over from Bscherreh, a walk of two hours' distance, and chanted a short service—sometimes a goatherd or two would join him, sometimes our servants or muleteers, but whether alone or not the voice of prayer and praise rose there every morning at dawn of day, and always sounded appropriate and due on what seemed holy ground, and, instead of breaking the silence, really seemed to make the solitude more apparent.

The Cedars form one group or grove covering an undulating piece of ground not a mile in circumference; they are not scattered about, but stand in one dense mass, after passing the boundary of which, there is not a shrub to be seen for many miles; there are about four hundred young trees, in themselves a beautiful and noble little forest, thronging round the patriarchs or "Apostles," as they are called by the Maronites; of these venerable trees there are yet twelve, besides another as old which has been lying on the ground for the last five or six years past; there is another very old one, which has evidently been burned; and of which so little remains that one cannot be sure of its generation; but these "twelve Apostles" are unmistakeable, although the peasants believe that no one can count them—that some magic puzzles those who try, and the numbers ever eludes their grasp. The largest of the old Saints is forty-five feet in girth, the second forty-two—while some of the branches we measured roughly at fifty-eight paces in length; whether they can have lived three thousand years, as the tradition avers, I am not called on to decide, and as the principal trunk of the fallen tree has been destroyed, it is impossible to find any vegetable history written upon its rings; but one likes to fancy the legend true, and to call them, as the Arabs do, the "Friends of Solomon;" while, involuntarily, one speaks of them in the language of his father David, as "the cedars which the Lord hath planted." One great charm of the encampment here, especially after the society of the good people of Eh'den, is the utter silence and solitude: it is such an indescribable comfort to encamp out of the sound of village dogs and jackals, and to be able to leave one's tent door open, without fear of an intruder; perchance in the morning a pretty boy or a rosy-faced girl would lead a couple of hundred goats down one of the little dells, their bells tinkling softly as they passed, — but no other sound of man ever broke the silence; Nature herself, however, was never silent — the cicale here were extraordinarily loud, and the trees were full of little birds of the brightest green and gold plumage, with a sweet, clear note, while thousands of tiny lizards glided about everywhere: and to lie upon the soft sand and the dry bed of cedar spines, under the cool, green shade, listening to all these sweet sounds, letting one's thoughts wander back into the long ages of which these trees are standing witnesses, looking out the while over the hot, barren mountains and down the many coloured gorge, to the snow-white coast, and the blue sea twinkling beyond, with the horizon apparently half way up the sky (the effect of our own lofty position) — all this deliciousness is recompence enough for any amount of fatigue and trouble incurred in reaching them. The place has but one drawback — want of water, the nearest spring being three quarters of an hour off; and also that nothing but the commonest provisions are procurable at Bscherreh.

We were now 6100 feet above the sea, and we had expected to be colder even than we were at Eh'den in the nights, but the Equinox approached, and we were told that it would be warm after that, — and so it proved; the thermometer was at 45° one morning, and at 67° at the same hour on the next day! We had come again to the time of the full moon, and this was indeed the place to be “read aright” by its holy light; night after night we used to wander through the moonlit glades, watching the light silvering the mountain which stretches its giant arms with everlasting, strong tenderness round the ancient trees, and listening to the owls hooting here and there in the thick boughs. One night we had a still more beautiful and striking scene: it was the eve of the 14th of September, the day on which the Emperor Constantine is supposed to have seen the Cross of fire shining in the sky, in consequence of which miraculous appearance both he and his whole army received the Gospel of true Light, and Salvation through Christ was proclaimed throughout his dominions; the festival is kept by beacon-fires lit upon every mountain-top in Syria, beginning with the Cedar mountain, besides bon-fires in every village, handing on the good tidings, as it were, from one to the other throughout the land; it is a fine idea, and on a calm night, it is still finer in reality; the flames of each fire as they rose and fell in the night breeze shining against the deep azure sky, were exceedingly pretty, and every here and there a long train of fire was laid up the side of the mountain, like a fiery snake, which, catching the wind now on this side, now on that, seemed really to have caught also the wriggling, gliding motion of a living serpent.

Layard mentions a curious fact that occurred when he was at Kouyunjik, of a sweet smell proceeding from some wood burning on a fire made by his workmen: they had taken one of the beams from the excavation, just where an inscription on the building denoted that the roof had been made of cedar wood brought from the Lebanon 3000 years before: this is doubly curious because the Cedars of Lebanon are not the Red Cedar so fragrant in burning, but a white which gives out no particular fragrance when burned: in one's encampment there, one's fire is always made of the small branches broken down by the wind; and some of the chips and shavings cut off from one of the oldest "Saints" which lies now upon the ground, were put into ours, but no perfume came from it save that of the fresh resinous smell of any kind of pine-tree wood. Perhaps that proceeding from the cedar wood at Kouyunjik was only this resinous fragrance, which, though very sweet, is not that of the red Indian cedar to which we are accustomed as a perfume.

We wanted to see the celebrated Convent of Khannobin, which though not the largest in the Lebanon is the residence of the Maronite Patriarch—so we set off one morning at eight o'clock and proceeded by the same road as we had come, descending to Bscherreh—a large village of very tumble-down houses planted as thickly as possible with mulberries and poplars, but peopled with very plain men and women—a striking contrast to the handsome merry Eh'denites with whom they are always at war—perhaps from jealousy or mortified vanity. Outside the village, built into and under and over the most extraordinary assemblage of insane-looking rocks, is the curious old Convent of Mar Serkis, and a few minutes further on comes the white foamy cascade of the Kadîsha rushing down amidst ferns and flowers—indeed this whole valley is smiling with flowers of all kinds and colours. Then we ascended the other side, and passing through the beautiful village of Hasroun found ourselves opposite to Hadshît—so close, as the crow flies, that the inhabitants of one village can speak to their neighbours of the other across the valley, while the splendid chasm between descends, first in green terraces and then in perpendicular walls of blue limestone cliffs, to the depth of a thousand feet. Hasroun is the most luxuriant spot we saw in the Lebanon—every inch of soil is cultivated, and the place is buried in thickets, and forests of thorns, walnuts, planes, poplars, figs and prickly oaks, tangled over and wreathed together with immense festoons of vines, besides those in more decorously-pruned vineyards; white and yellow clematis and honeysuckle were in all the hedges, and real fields of wheat and English-looking grass on all the slopes. Riding on over breezy downs we passed a gigantic cavern in the rocks on the other side of the chasm, and a lofty waterfall, which must be very fine in spring, as it has but one perpendicular fall; and then we looked down, first on the small Convent of Mar Elisha, and then on Khanobîn to which, however, we did not descend as it would have taken us five or six hours more; it did not appear to us equal either in size or position to the Convent of Mar Antoun, nor is the valley, at least as seen from above, as varied in outline or as brilliant in colouring as the other. We returned to Hasroun, feeling very much like cinders out of a furnace, and put ourselves to cool under a walnut grove, where the people brought us great baskets of figs and grapes, for which we duly paid some trifle—but if you stop in a vineyard you may eat as much as you like, gratis ; any, however, that are carried away you are expected to pay for : this is in accordance with the old Israelite rule in Deuteronomy xxiii. 24. We were so much tired that we caught at the offer made by a peasant to show us a short cut to the Cedars — but let all weary travellers beware how they lend an ear to such flattering tales of peasants, who either scramble over tracks where no horses can follow them, or not unfrequently find themselves at fault, and leave you in the lurch : so it was with our guide— he led us for three mortal hours over the most thoroughly atrocious paths conceivable, and then deserted us, leaving us in such scorching heat, that not only ourselves, but even our dragoman and saïs and the two muleteers, who had accompanied us, were made ill by it.

Our last afternoon at the Cedars afforded us the extraordinary sight of what is called, I believe, a false sun : the mist had jammed itself up into dense masses, like a rough sea of ice-pack, filling up and smoothing over the whole valley, and extending over the sea beyond ; behind this the sun in due time sunk,—but, ten minutes after, another sun of a flaming blood-colour popped up, and after shining with an awful kind of dark brilliancy for about a quarter of an hour, it also faded away and died behind the mist-clouds,—very marvellous it was altogether.

We took leave of the grand old trees by moonlight, after a week's stay, mounting on horseback before 4 A.M. and began to ascend great Makhmel, or the Cedar mountain.* The path was of course steep and in some

* Makhmel is the name given to this, the loftiest mountain in the Lebanon, by the people of the district of Tripoli ; the mountaineers themselves call it always and only Jebel el Arz—the mountain of the Cedars ; its highest peak is called, as are all the highest peaks through-places so narrow as to be rather giddy work for climbing, but in no place in the least dangerous, or very fatiguing, except from the violent wind and the rarefied air. Just as it began to dawn we met a troop of goats, the goatherds singing in chorus to the music of a well-played reed-pipe; very sweet and pleasant it sounded, and a very uncommon incident it was in Syrian travel. Nothing could be more beautiful than the changing views at every fresh step in the ascent, the early light telling out the colours in the clearest and loveliest purity, while from each valley and nook wreaths of delicate bright blue mist rose like mysterious veils, slowly withdrawing as the dawn advanced. Suddenly the sun lit up the summits of the peaks, bathing each with its own flood of golden splendour, and, resting there, widened in a sudden sheet of light over the valleys below, flying over Eh'den with giant strides as we had so often watched it from the valley itself. The sun had but touched the upper valleys when we reached the summit — or rather very near the summit; our companions ascended the highest peak, but the coldness of the thin air at this height rendered me incapable of going any further, and our resting-place commanded such an ample view, that we did not much regret losing the northern part over the wide plain of Homs and Hamah, bounded by faint blue mountains, which can only be seen from the real summit. We spread our large map and compass on the ground before us, as we gazed at the living map beneath — more living than a landscape usually appears, from the swiftly moving light out Syria, Jebel el Khodib — the summit mountain. The height of the Jebel el Khodib here, which is now believed to be the highest mountain in Syria, has been lately ascertained to be 10,400 feet above the Mediterranean; this Khodib is at some distance still further north of the peak our party ascended, which was then believed to be the highest.

of the rising sun, gliding, as it were, with life-giving beams over the picture—now here, now there—waking up each portion, till it seemed really living, breathing, under the rapid, silent changes.

We were seated on a narrow ridge or backbone between the peaks,—beneath us, on one side, the two rifts of the Kadisha sloped down to the Mediterranean, their light blue and grey cliffs contrasting most vividly with the orange rocks and red soil in the same gorges: they were divided from the turquoise blue—such a blue!—sea by snow-white cliffs, sweeping in many a graceful curve along the coast. On the other side of our ridge the mountain sloped still more precipitously and smoothly down into a region of sand, beyond which came a range of hills, picturesque and rugged, of dark browns and purples, dividing it from the perfectly flat Bekâa*, stretching out in green and brown to the foot of the opposite mountain range—the Anti-Lebanon—which was now of course lying in deep dark shadow against the magnificently glowing morning sky: one dark spot immediately under these mountains was Baalbek; and as we looked the sun passed a giant step across the whole plain, and brightened up the green plantations of the village, so that, with a telescope, the Temple could be discerned. Directly to the south rose our beloved Sunnīn, from this side a ridge of rosy crags, rugged and jagged; beyond that, far away, a lovely and graceful mountain stood quite alone—the blue cone, precipitous on one side, sloping down gently on the other, striped with lilac shades—it needed nothing to tell us that this was Hermon,—Jebel esh Scheik, or the chief of mountains: to its left, faint blue mountains faded away in the distance, and these we knew were in the Lejah: to its right one bright blue ridge, ending suddenly in the sea, was Carmel. Then the sunshine shot down right under our feet and lit up the dark shades of the Cedars, and the hard, white, solid little clouds, like icebergs on the sea, expanded and joined the lighter mist-wreaths that had risen from the valleys, and the distances became hazy and the glorious colouring more faint,—in fact for really extensive views in this country, the first hour of sunrise and the last of sunset are the only times of day when they can be perfectly seen; at all other hours the heat has thickened the air and faded the brilliant colouring which is here the greatest charm. The view from Mount Hermon is considerably more extensive, as there are no intercepting peaks near at hand: but that from the Cedar Mountain is certainly more varied and beautiful, even if it is not, as one traveller calls it, “the loveliest yet grandest scene that the world possesses,”—it is indescribably and grandly lovely.

* From the Hebrew Bikha, meaning plain, as this is the plain of North Syria. From the Arabic Bekaa the Spanish Vega is derived—signifying a plain between mountains.

We had a long, tiresome descent of nearly two hours before we reached our tents, which had been pitched near a clear and very cold source called 'Ain Ata, where we were thankful to creep under some fine walnut trees out of the burning, fervid sun; we had a fine view to look at all day, — Hermon's graceful head towering up in the distance, while close to us lay nestled in a mountain basin, the pretty Lake Yemouni, and fiery red mountains speckled with prickly oak rose all round us. This spot is subject to sudden squalls, coming over the heads of the mountains; our tent was not properly secured at first, and was rudely overturned by one of them, and we left behind us a variety of stains on the rocks and ground from the upset ink-bottles, that must have puzzled the goats for many days after. We were glad of a good sleep that night, but on the next we mounted at 1 A. M., and started for the great plain of the Bekâa, the heat of which no one would willingly encounter by day, in the summer. The road lay up and down steep glens and vales, thickly wooded with low trees and shrubs, — pine, prickly oak, and white cypress—all of them twisted and stunted into strange, grotesque shapes, which, in the deep shades of the waning moon and the starlight, assumed most mysterious appearances: — now an old friar begging with his arms stretched out and his head thrown back — now a lady with a long train and a dancing step — now “bears with ragged staffs” on each side of the path like constables — now sturdy dogs, and, more frequently, cocks with or without tails, and their heads perked up till I half expected to hear the horrid crow close to my ear; and in the lowest glade a gigantic knight on a charger seemed to approach, his black armour shining in the moonlight and a white shield glistening on his arm — but his noble horse suddenly dropped his head, the knight mysteriously vanished, and the white shield turned into the white, smooth trunk of an old gnarled oak! We stopped for five minutes at Deir el Ah'mar, which seemed to be a hamlet inhabited by dogs only — no other living thing was moving; the dawn was commencing as we arrived at the dead flat of the great plain, and very pretty it was to watch the light darting on Hermon and the great mountains we had just left, colouring the summits into a pink, brilliant as a rose leaf, above the purple violet and browns of the lower mountains and the green plain on which we now cast long shadows behind us. The Morning Star was still shining with serene beauty, as we turned aside to the single Column in the plain, about which little or nothing is known, as neither inscription nor sculpture remains upon it: otherwise it is little injured,—it is of the Corinthian order, standing on a pedestal of steps; the column is not nearly so lofty as that of Diocletian at Alexandria, which is eighty feet high; this one is only sixty, but there is something grand in its loneliness and silent mystery: doubtless our horses thought it uncanny, for they every one shied at it, and could scarcely be persuaded to go round it. The sun was shining brightly on the famous Six Columns of Baalbek as we reached the village at 5 A.M.; we got into a garden on the north side of the Temple, but the heat was very great, and we had all fallen asleep before either our tents or our breakfast had arrived.

As the heat was very great here—96° in the shade each day—we did not visit the Temple till after dinner: when we thought ourselves fortunate in seeing it first by sunset; it is a fine scene in the morning, but no single and incomplete architectural object can be more lovely than the Six lonely Columns standing with such dignity and majesty in the midst of desolation and ruin around them, bathed in the golden glory shed by the setting sun, with the Temple of Jupiter seen through them, a Mosque beyond, and the chain of barren mountains crimsoned into beauty behind them.

Baalbek has been so frequently and ably illustrated, by pen and pencil, in the last few years, that only a very few words are necessary to record the impression made by its graceful majesty upon the traveller; and it is to be hoped that many more generations will see these ruins as they are—so enormous and ponderous were the materials used, that the puny hand of modern man can do but little to injure them—earthquakes are the only destroyers to be feared.

"Time hath not harmed the eternal monument;
 Time is not here, nor days, nor months, nor years —
 For sure those mighty piles shall overlive
 The feeble generations of mankind. . . .
 A mighty mass remains; enough to tell us
 How great our fathers were, how little we.
 Men are not what they were: their crimes and follies
 Have dwarfed them down from the old hero race
 To such poor things as we!"*

Ascending a lofty flight of steps at the extreme east, the worshipper entered a magnificent open portico with a square hall at each end, — thence he passed through a hexagonal court surrounded with columns, into the great quadrangle, four hundred and forty feet long, across which a double colonnade † led to another flight of steps, which gave access to the platform on which stood the Temple of the Sun. This edifice was surrounded by fifty-four columns of seventy-five feet in height; the loftiest, it is said, in the world, and appearing still higher than they really are from their (almost) extreme slenderness — they are but six feet six inches in diameter. ‡ No trace of the cella of this temple remains, and there are some doubts that it was ever built; only six of the fifty-four columns of the peristyle are now standing (although the bases of a great many are still to be seen in situ, the present outside wall being built up between them), but these six are the chief beauty of Baalbek —

"Flinging their shadows from on high,
 Like dials which the wizard Time Had raised to count his ages by:"

* Thalaba.

† Destroyed to build a Christian Church, which, in the time of Constantine the Great, occupied this court.

‡ The usual proportion of a Corinthian column is $8\frac{1}{2}$ diameters to the height, whereas the height of the columns of the Temple of the Sun are nearly 12 diameters: those of the Temple of Jupiter have 10 diameters.

they tell their own tale by the exquisite carving of their capitals, which marks the purest Corinthian ; the acanthus-leaves are cut with remarkable freedom and richness, by no means overloaded, and the abacus is supported by delicate volutes of the most graceful design ; it is curious to observe the effect of the weather upon these columns — on the north side almost every leaf and many of the volutes are perfect — while on the other they are shapeless blocks.

The whole of this Temple and the Great Courts rest upon giant walls supported by the Platform of Cyclopean masonry, justly considered one of the wonders of the world ; in the western end are the three stones — rocks one ought to call them — from which the Temple was called Trilithon by the Greeks, — two of them are sixty-four feet, and the third sixty-three feet long — all three are thirteen feet both in height and in thickness. The Platform, of which every stone is gigantic, is supported by three passages running under its entire length and breadth, vaulted, and of exceedingly fine workmanship, the enormous stones nicely and neatly joined, — they are wonderful places to walk through — handsomer and of finer finish than the vaults beneath the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem. Of course the beauty of Baalbek is in the Temples, but the Platform was, to me at least, a still greater interest, — one had the same crushing feeling of the long ages of its past history come over one's mind, that one had felt in the Temples of Egypt, — and all in vain — for the shadows of its antiquity elude one's grasp : it is a relief to seize upon tradition, and to believe it modern enough for Solomon's workmanship ; but one fancies one recognises the Phœnician (Canaanite) stamp upon its massive simplicity, which may be called barbarous, but which, in the hands of the Egyptians and Phœnicians, became sublime also. Possibly Baalbek is much older than Tadmor, and was one of the cities already standing in the country before Joshua marked out the boundaries of the Israelites: it cannot be the Baalath built by Solomon when he built "Tadmor in the wilderness," both of them stone cities, because Josephus distinctly explains that to have been near Gézer, in the tribe of Dan; while that the rocks of which it is built are so much more enormous than anything at Tadmor, may be partly accounted for by the fact, of the quarries at Baalbek being so much nearer to the building than those of Tadmor. Looking up from the exterior of these huge stones, and seeing the Six Columns shoot up skywards with their slender, tapering shafts, they have been not inaptly compared to "Ariel mounted on a mammoth's back!"

Although the ground has filled up the interior of the Great Court to such a height — at least twenty feet — as to render it impossible to form a correct judgment, one can hardly imagine that these beautiful walls were sufficiently high inside for the very great size of the area; the court was entirely surrounded with recesses, having six, four, or two columns in front of each, formed of Egyptian red granite and porphyry, quantities of the débris of which lie all about; each recess contained a number of niches for statues, probably standing above others now buried, in which the priests or worshippers sat; these are all richly sculptured, many with eagles, fruit, &c., but the Egyptian asp spoken of by some travellers we thought very little identical with its supposed original. This temple was dedicated to all the gods, with Baal as supreme, and is supposed to have been built, or at least the greater part of it, in the time of the Emperor Antoninus Pius, A.D. 138—161. I often pondered where the columns that Sultan Suleymân took in 1550 from this Temple to adorn Santa Sophia could have stood; I conclude they were among these small ones closing in the recesses of the Great Court, as they seemed to have been the only columns in Baalbek of coloured marble or of like dimensions.

The Temple of Jupiter is about two hundred feet to the south of the Temple of the Sun, beyond the grand Court, and is said to have been built at the same time; the ground on which it stands is much lower than that of its imperial neighbour, but it has its own platform: it is larger than the Parthenon, but, probably from the very lofty columns near it and the impossibility of getting a distant view of the whole, it appears considerably smaller, and one has no idea of its real size till you come to measurements. Dr. Robinson remarks that nowhere else does it seem so impossible to reconcile the gigantic size of the fallen stones, of the same entablature or column with those still standing, as at Baalbek; so perfect are the proportions that neither the size, nor any other one characteristic strikes the eye, in the perfect balance of the whole. It has another peculiar charm in its completeness, for although ruined and hidden, Baalbek still remains as a whole; perhaps no Temple, (always excepting the Theseum at Athens, which is six hundred years older than Baalbek), remains so complete, nor is the execution of the details surpassed by any other work of the kind. The cella is surrounded with forty-two columns, a triple row at the east end forming the portico, within which is the famous doorway, whose sides are formed of single stones forty-two feet high; it is covered, overloaded, all round with border after border of the most exquisite sculpture, fruit, flowers, leaves, and wheat-ears, interspersed with little Cupids and panthers;

but the most interesting of the ornaments is the large Eagle sculptured on the soffit of this doorway, holding a caduceus in his talons, and the strings of garlands, upheld on each side by genii, are twisted in his beak. The ceiling of the peristyle is equally rich, and as a great deal of it has fallen, it can be closely examined: it is divided into hexagonal compartments, each one filled by a bust or figure carved in such high relief as to seem leaning out of its frame; the contours of the figures are very graceful.

These Temples had been built about 800 years when they were turned into a fortress; they have sustained several sieges and much rough usage since: the Saracens and Crusaders built up walls within and without, which now remain to the extreme discomfort of the traveller: there is, however, a fine Saracenic palace or castle, close to the Temple of Jupiter, whose unadorned architecture contrasts well with the rich sculpture of its Corinthian neighbours; the walls are strong and massive, and the octagonal hall in the centre, which is gracefully vaulted, is remarkably handsome.

At a short distance from the great Temple, standing alone among ruins, huts, and gardens, there is a little gem of a Temple; it is shaped like a star-fish, the seven columns surrounding it being placed in a circle, and the cella wall receding in a semicircle between each; it had once a domed roof, and is most richly ornamented, within and without, with sculpture, the delicately carved capitals of the fluted columns reminding one of some of the best things of the kind at Venice; the whole Temple is only thirty-eight feet in diameter, and, alas, much destroyed; I am convinced it was intended for a kiosk or boudoir for the gods, when they left the great Temple to take a little recreation.

Then there are the Quarries, to which we rode one evening, where the famous stone, sixty-eight feet long, and weighing probably 1100 tons, still lies unremoved; the peasantry believe that the genii, working amicably with the men of old, carried these stones for them, but, being one day offended at something, this stone was dropped in the quarry, and no human strength has been found capable of lifting it since; it is said to be the largest stone hewn for building in the world,—the obelisk in the quarry at Assouān is, however, twenty-seven feet longer and nearly as wide. These quarries point to such gigantic works, that one does not wonder they have given rise to legends of supernatural agency—adding the craft of jinns and genii to the might of the “giants who lived in those days.” At Baalbek one learns to think naturally of the Rephaïm, the Emims, the Zanzummims, the Zouzims, and the Anakims, whose fathers, it is said, won from Heaven the reward of a more than mortal strength, for having given up solitude and celibacy on the tops of the mountains, and returned to a life of usefulness among their kinsfolk in the plains,—the best argument for the “athletic religion” so much in fashion at the present time, that I have ever come across—Mr. Kingsley should certainly make use of the legend! The quarries, which extend over a great distance, are very striking from their sharply cut cliffs, or clefts, and their deep caverns (some of which appear to have been made use of, both as tombs and dwelling-places), some supported by pillars, others only open-mouthed, and from the strange, grotesque forms in which the rock has been left,—besides its unusually brilliant colouring—orange and white, blue and grey, and a bright coppery green. From one of these wild mystic-looking nooks, a very large eagle soared out slowly and calmly; he disdained to take any further notice of our presence, but settling himself with much dignity on an adjoining point, his mate glided silently out of a hole close to us, and disappeared behind him—they were scarcely four yards from our heads.

One of the questions of interest concerning Baalbek is its name, which still puzzles the learned: it is believed by all to be its original name, or, at least, an ancient one, to which the Arabs, when they conquered Syria in A. D. 630, wisely returned; but if the bek is a Phœnician (and hence Hebrew) word, it has not yet been found in the language: some persons think that it may have been derived from the Egyptian baki, meaning city, and that the Greeks applied it when Cœlo-Syria fell to the lot of the Græco-Egyptian kingdom, in which case it would be as modern as their name of Heliopolis, and means only the same thing: Dr. Robinson, however, suggests that it is from the later Arabic bakka, a throng or crowd, and that it describes the place where worshippers of Baal met in a crowd. Some have tried to derive it from the same word as the name of the plain beside it—Bekaa—(Bikha, Hebrew for plain) as if to denote “Baal of the plain;” but this is untenable, as the k is not the same letter when used in Baalbek as in Bikha.

A little Wely near the town is shaded by a cypress tree worth seeing: though not nearly as tall as the splendid cypresses of Smyrna, it is so round, so full, and so luxuriant as to make a specimen fit for a picture,—it is said to have been as large and full more than a century ago.

We left Baalbek at 11 P.M., after four days' stay; our dragoman was ill, and we took a guide, who led us for some time, up and down, over apparently barren mountains, but by so good a path, that we did not suspect we were going wrong: there was no moon, only the beautiful stars, and one radiant planet near Orion, about the heavenly birth and parentage of which the saïs told me a long legend, of which, unfortunately, I took in only about half. At last we reached the brow of the mountain, and turned into a tremendous ravine with a torrent roaring at the bottom; the road became a succession of smooth, sloping slabs of rock, and presently the guide sat down, and coolly informed us that he knew nothing about the route, and could only say that we were on a goat-path, where horses never passed, but which ultimately went down to the bottom of the ravine: the whole side of the mountain was enveloped in pitch darkness, so that we could not see one step before us, and it seemed more than likely that we should reach the bottom by an expeditious, but not precisely agreeable mode of descent, as the path was nowhere more than two feet wide. We were benumbed with cold and fatigue, and excessively sleepy: however, there was nothing for it but to go on, trusting to the sure-footedness of our horses; we finally reached the end of the path in safety, but I need not say that the four hours we were on that mountain side were neither very short nor very agreeable. Morning dawned as we emerged into the pretty plain of Surghāya, and the ride through the smiling green pastures was refreshing, with the wild craggy summits of the Anti-Lebanon towering over head, and Hermon filling up the end of the picture. We got to Zebdāny at 6 A.M., a bright pretty place, with the hedges covered with sweet white roses and clematis, and English-looking gates, neatly made and painted, to the gardens: this plain is very rich and luxuriant; Bludan, the summer residence of the Europeans of Damascus, standing perched up, halfway to heaven, on a green plateau near the summit of one of the mountains. We resumed our route early the next morning, passing over the rest of the plain of the Bārrada with its pretty waterfall and light Roman bridge, and the fine pass of Abila, the modern Souk; the steep cliffs, which close in with beautiful windings, are covered with tablets and tombs, some of them ornamented with columns and carved doorways, — one of the tablets gives the name of the Roman legate of Syria, by whose order this road was cut through the mountain. This was the scene of an immense triumph of the arms of Islam under Khaled, in A.D. 634, over much more than ten times their own number of Christians.

The road was most lively with passengers; one troop we passed was of about two score of Bashi-Bazouks, going out to hunt, with falcons standing on their wrists and long spears in their hands; then strings of camels and Bedouins, sometimes fifty in a string, and mules without end. Unfortunately we took a wrong turn, and instead of following our mules to 'Ain Fijeh, we went along green lanes and woods and streams till a peasant told us we were but an hour or two from Damascus, and we had to go back some miles before we could cross the river; it was midday before we came to a lovely village, wherein we rested, for we were faint with fatigue and hunger, having tasted nothing that day; then we ascended the hills on the other side, and found ourselves in the Desert, El Sah'ra, over which the sun was pouring his fiercest rays as we paced along the winding track, over one featureless hill after another, the wretch of a guide continually refusing to go any further, and having to be collared and thumped into obedience and utility: probably this Desert is green enough in the early spring, for between the loose stones over which we trod, like that of a sea beach, most laboriously, numbers of very pale lilac colchicums were springing up at every step, wherever one saw the soil beneath the stones, it seemed as hard as the stone itself; and one could not help thinking of the curse with which God threatened the Israelites: "The heaven that is over thy head shall be as brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron." We were not of course entitled to the protection of Mooslim angels, or we should have been very thankful to be able to say with Muhammad, "The people in Syria are happy indeed, for the kind angels of heaven spread their sheltering wings above their head," — certainly no kind angels sheltered us.

At last we descended into a fig orchard, and soon came to the river; all the rest of the way was under the deep delicious shade of planes, walnuts, and fruit trees, beside the rushing, tumbling stream whose cool sound was music to our burnt up ears; and at 2.30 P.M. we thankfully found the tents placed beside that never-to-be-forgotten 'Ain Fijeh.

The Temple of Fijeh is thought to be one of those built for the original Phœnician Baal-worship of Syria, like that of Afka, to which it bears some resemblance: it is built in front of the living rock, which was probably cut out to admit of it, and was very simple, containing only one hall, about 30 feet square, built of very large stones, between which the trees have long ago pushed themselves; the Temple stands half on a platform or ledge of rock which has been left bridging over the cavern, whence, out of darkness, mystery, and silence, not a gentle bubbling spring, but a full-grown river, leaps into life, rushing past the rocks with a great song and bustle of joy for a few yards, when it tumbles headlong over a rocky ledge in masses of snowy foam; the trees everywhere crowding down its banks, bending over its waters, dipping in and playing with the laughing waves which seem to leap up to meet them, and arching over the broad, full stream in long vistas of watery loveliness and lanes of greenery. I believe this is one of the fullest sources in the world, springing at once, as it does, into a river: it is the clearest water possible, and singularly bright in colour, in the morning a full deep emerald-green—in the evening a sapphire-blue: it was impossible to help thinking of the two jewels, so exactly did it resemble their clear gem-like hues by turns. Beside the source, only two or three yards at one side, there is another Temple, still smaller than that above the cavern,—its very massiveness and simplicity telling of its extreme antiquity;—one square column still stands, and there is a cornice, a bold but simple cavetto like that we saw at Afka, and afterwards both at Deir el Ashayr and Rukhleh; the whole building is very rough, but a sort of huge, massive grandeur hangs about the now almost formless stones; and the situation is as romantic and poetical as can be imagined. It must have been in a spot precisely resembling 'Ain Fijeh that Egeria taught the Roman king those secrets which made Purity a Religion, and Virtue its own best reward. It is a delicious place;—the valley, scarcely 200 yards wide, cannot contain itself for joy at its own luxuriance, but flings up orchard after orchard, vineyard after vineyard, upon the mountain at each side; and the river goes laughing through the woods, pouring out lapfuls of richness as it goes, and merrily bathing the tree-roots that revel in its cooling stream. We scrambled up part of the mountain to look down on the tangled crowd of trees below,—the contrast of the beauty below and the yellow barrenness above is most striking. The village is a miserable concern, but we were pleased at seeing two newly plastered Mooslim graves, with a little bed of bright flowers formed on the top of each,—they were the first we had seen blossoming over Mooslims,—but afterwards in Asia Minor it became a common sight.

We found the villagers so troublesome that day and the next morning, that we moved off to a delicious little meadow of real thick springy grass beside the bright rapid river,—a favourite bathing-place with travellers,—about half an hour on the Damascus road, and settled ourselves under a rock to sketch: a goatherd politely brought up a goat, and feasted us on warm frothy milk in an ancient silver bowl, engraved with Cufic inscriptions. This spot has not the romance or the antiquarian interest of the fountain, but it is extremely pretty, the valley widening enough to let one see the deep blue-green of the river, and the splendid cliffs changing from yellow sameness into blue-grey crags, jagged and broken into rifts of the most picturesque nature. We had had enough of the Desert, El Sah'ra, the day before, so we chose to try the lower or river path recommended by the peasants,—a river path indeed, for it was chiefly in the river, across the windings of which we waded nine times, the horses nearly up to their middles and scarcely able to keep a footing in the rushing tide; and then pushed through the thick groves, dividing the trees and hedges as we went, to the imminent peril of hats and legs, and riding-habits that were already well dipped in the stream. At last we came out on the barren mountains, where an eagle welcomed us with a Jupiter kind of nod before he deigned to move on; and hurrying over the hills we reached Khubbet-es-Seiyār nearly an hour before sunset; there was a furious wind blowing, but we found shelter in the pretty wely, while we sat down to enjoy the famous scene, from which it is said Muhammad piously turned away : se non è vero, è ben trovato.

The vast plain of yellow sand is bounded on all sides by mountains,—Hermon on the right (west) towering up close at hand dark and craggy ;—to the south, the mountains of the Haurān, in all the tender hues of distance ;—to the east, the pass up which the road to Palmyra winds, joining the craggy Anti-Lebanon upon which we stood ; at our feet, and extending to the middle of the plain, is the mass—thirty miles in extent—of gardens and groves in all the riches of the fullest summer foliage, deep and bright green of every shade ; in the midst of which, almost buried as it were under the leaves, is the city, oblong shaped, but with one suburb (the Meidān) stretching out a long thin line to the south, shining with a dazzling, delicate white, like a city built of pearls, shooting up its tapering minarets and graceful domes, as if in jealousy of the poplars around it : truly it is no wonder that the Arabs who first bore the banner of Islam through the wearisome desert of Arabia, burst into shouts and transports of joy when they beheld these towers and palaces, rising among the verdant plains and murmuring streams that make such sweet music in the air ; one might have thought the pretty buildings, like the walls of Ilion, had risen to the tune. One cannot take in a scēne like this in a moment, and we had but just begun to understand it, and to feel satisfied with feeding on its beauty, when the sun sunk behind Hermon, throwing one last gift over the city, of such a crimsoning hue as turned the pearl into an opal, and lit up the trees into almost metallic lustre, bathing the mountains in a flood of peach-blossom that really made the whole view one of quite unearthly beauty. It lasted but a few minutes: the glorious dream passed away, the plain dimmed in shadow, and we descended the hill as quickly as we could to reach the gate before it should be closed for the night. It was just dark when we entered the city, and our first introduction to its long, narrow, winding streets, perfectly and entirely dark, save where a café or some miserable lantern made the rest of the darkness seem still darker, was not of the pleasantest, certainly the last appellation any one would give them now is the word "straight," unless it meant a passage too narrow or strait to turn in; a succession of horrible yells and howls announced, every now and then, that some one had gone over a wretched dog, as we went stumbling on over the dust-heaps in the way. At last we reached a very small door, where our dragoman was waiting for us, and we dismounted at the hotel, which seemed to our tired eyes and after our six weeks of tent-life, like an enchanted palace, with its brilliant colours, latticed windows, and lamps hanging between oleander and citron trees, loaded with blossom, and filling the cool night air with fragrance; we went to sleep in good, clean beds to the music of the falling fountain, which splashed gently over the marble basin in the centre of our apartment; with a satisfactory feeling even in our dreams that, at last, we were in Damascus.

CHAP. XIV.

THE FAIR CITY.

"Damascus is the mole on the cheek of beauty—the plumage of the peacock of Paradise—the brilliant neck of the ring-dove—and the collar of beauty."—Arabian Poet.

It is curious that of the four oldest cities in the world—Sidon, Hamah, Damascus, and Hebron,—not one has lost its first original name: Hamah became Epiphania under the Greeks, but retained the name less than three hundred years; Damascus is called by the Arabs of the Desert, Esh-Sham, but is known to them also, as to all the world, by the name used for it by Abraham the Patriarch; it is the only large and flourishing city of the four, having 150,000 inhabitants, and immense wealth within its walls: while Hamah, the Syrian Manchester, contains only 30,000. In architectural objects of all kinds Damascus is incalculably inferior to Cairo, but in natural beauty, how far superior! so that although there are quite enough fine and striking buildings to lend variety to the scene, the eye forgets to need the work of man among the enchanting verdure, rushing streams, lofty shades, and beautiful mountains that surround the city. I cannot understand any one comparing the Bazaars of either Cairo or Constantinople to those of Damascus: those of the former have no pretension to building of any kind, besides being much diluted with the garb and features of the West, and those of the latter are entirely Europeanized, while Damascus is thoroughly Oriental, containing in its streets such an endless, indescribable variety of all nations and classes East and South of the Mediterranean, that it is impossible to tire of its sights or of its interests, in the amusement and pleasure of the moment: while looking backwards in the stream of Time, few places to the east of Europe can equal it in historical interest.

The Pashalik of Damascus extends up the whole country to Hamah along the Orontes, and east of the Jordan down to Petra. There is a large garrison always kept in the Citadel, and the city is governed by a Pasha of the highest rank, who is always a Field-Marshal (Mushir) and, — far more important — the Emir el Haj, or Prince of the holy Mekka caravan. It is a city of very large manufacture, and there is probably no other city existing, unblest with water carriage, with such extensive commercial trade; its silks supply Egypt and travel eastward till they meet those of Persia and Kashmir — its cottons and woollens, goat's or camel's hair stuffs are used throughout the East, and also in Egypt and Arabia: its gold and silver ornaments and its arms supply the Desert, Arabia and Syria, while its fruit is eaten from Tiflis and Baghdad to the shores of Europe. It is not easy to enumerate a hundredth part of the treasures that are displayed in the Bazaars of Damascus: they are mostly divided, as in all Oriental towns, into classes, — the silks in one bazaar, the spices in another, and so on: but many booths combine variety enough to chase away any chance of monotony; among the finest and most costly things sold are the golden-wove stuffs of Mekka, which are very beautiful, and are chiefly used for the thick stiff cloaks of Sheikhs and Emirs, and are dyed in rich bright colours, violet, maroon, &c. &c. The carpets, silks, and shawls of Persia abound every where; they are of every class and sometimes of great beauty: from Persia also come finely ornamented nargilehs and embroideries of all kinds, Kashmîr and Bokhara shawls, old porcelain of great variety and delicacy, as well as from China; arms from Baghdad and Kashmîr, and gold and silver ornaments of all kinds, vases, cups, incense burners, perfume throwers, coffee services, &c. &c. The bazaar of made-up and second-hand clothes is particularly amusing, and as gay as the saddlers', which is full of housings and trappings of horses and mules, from the richest gold and silver embroidery, enriched with pearls, on velvet, down to the common but bright crimson leather saddles, and the many coloured harness of plaited worsted cords and tassels, decked with rows of white cowrie-shells and charms; then the preserves and confectionery, gum, spice, and drug bazaars — always graver and more perfumed than the others, — and the gay, lively cotton and printed muslin bazaar, full of colours and combinations of which one thought even Manchester must be innocent, but which are manufactured for the special delight of the Arab and the Kurd. Then come the narrow lanes of the red boots or yellow slippers, which seem numerous enough to shoe the population of Syria for twenty years; and the carpentry bazaar of carved, inlaid, and painted chests, so barbarously made but so delightfully pretty.

Remembering the extraordinary vicissitudes which the beautiful city has undergone, it is more a matter of wonder that any architectural objects should remain in its streets than that there are so few*, — one of the most distant possessions of Rome, farmed out and ground down for its revenues—the battle-field of Arabs, Saracens, and Christians, overrun by Kurds and Tartars, burned and destroyed by Timour,—it is a marvel that even the once beautiful church, parts of which are probably older than our era, should be still standing. The city walls have been preserved for convenience, and they bear, in some places, every mark of extreme antiquity; it is, indeed, very interesting to observe the different ages, which are frequently very distinctly marked in one small piece of wall, and to see how completely the old form realises in one's mind the stories of Rahab and the spies, and the two escapes of St. Paul. The moat is still wide around them, and in some places full of water, shaded over by trees; in others it is a dry receptacle for every kind of rotting filth and abomination; in truth, a ride round the outside of Damascus is a severe trial at all times to the olfactory nerves. The gates are mostly Roman, built over, added to, and altered by the Saracens, through whose tumble-down towers and broken battlements the fine Roman arch and bevelled masonry may still be distinguished; they are all of them very picturesque. The castle looks well, and would appear to have been once a strong building, and the Serai is handsome.

* A slight sketch of the history of Damascus in Note 1 may be found interesting to the general reader.

There is not much variety in the minarets of Damascus, except those of the Great Mosque, which are models of elegance and delicate beauty, very graceful and rich, though airy; viewed en masse they make a striking picture. The baths and cafés enliven every street: both are nearly always painted in broad, horizontal stripes of scarlet, blue, and white, which, though not in the least elegant or recherché—in fact, it is somewhat barbaric—yet is very effective and gay. Wherever you go inside the city, you look, at short intervals, into a dark, cool chamber in which are men smoking, lounging, chatting, and lemonade drinking ; or into a court shaded by delicious trees, with a bubbling fountain or a large tank of running water ; or into a larger, airier, lighted hall, gaily painted within and without, where men are resting after the delightful fatigues of the bath, wrapped in white garments, sipping coffee and smoking nargilehs : the noise that proceeds from both café and bath duly announcing their neighbourhood. Near the outskirts of the town they are still prettier, at least in the evening, when they are brilliantly lighted up with lamps hung in the trees, and always full of people ; one, by the Castle, is particularly pretty, with rude wooden platforms hanging over the rushing river, seeming as if slung, like a suspension bridge, by the wreaths of creepers that have flung themselves everywhere, and shaded by innumerable bending trees ; another, near the Bab Tuma, where the river is more foaming and its voice louder,—very rickety and wretched, but all the more picturesque for that,—hidden under weeping willows and poplars, pomegranates, and planes, presented an endless variety of costumes by night and by day in the various groups enjoying kief. Near the Castle, too, is another sight, a plane tree of which the trunk measures forty feet in circumference, and within which several hermits have lived, acquiring a green old age in a solitude they would not find there now (although the little door is yet unremoved in case of another occupant), since it is in the centre of a busy suburb, and always surrounded by crowds of laden mules, donkeys, and camels, with their noisy drivers.

Except for the cafés and baths, the streets of Damascus are duller than those of any other Oriental town, and people say they look poor because they expect so renowned a city to look grand; indeed, I have heard persons who have come back from a hurried visit to Damascus declaring that "the whole town was built of mud—nothing but mud walls everywhere!"—they had only glanced at the exterior, and did not perceive that there were well-built stone walls beneath the mud,—a strange, anomalous taste in our eyes, but the invariable Eastern custom: as soon as the stone wall is completed it is covered with a coating of mud, which hides all its solid goodness, and which looks tattered and miserable as soon as it begins to peel. The new houses are being built with handsome projecting windows opening on to the streets, and the gaily painted and gilt lattices are extremely pretty; but this is quite a modern and unusual innovation; in general, the long lanes wind about between high or low walls, but all quite blind, except for occasional insignificant doorways, topped with one small bit of carving, and an apology for a window stuck in here and there, seldom anything better than a rough hole or a long slit closely covered over by a ragged wooden lattice.

But stop at one of these miserable little doors (that is, if you are fortunate enough to have so good an introduction to the inmates as we found in the English missionary Mr. Robson), and let us see what is within-side. A little room or half dark passage leads into a small open court with a fountain and a leewān (a recess always on the north side of every court, furnished with a divan, the salon used by the inhabitants of the sleeping rooms which surround the three other sides of the court): this is occupied by the servants of the household; and from this another passage admits you into a much larger court, always paved with coloured marbles, and with one or more fountains shaded by pomegranates, lemon, orange, and oleander trees ; wherever you look, all is marble, both white and coloured. This court has its raised leewān, splendidly ornamented on the walls and ceiling, and its divan covered with rich brocades ; here you are generally received, and presented with lemonade, sweetmeats, and coffee ; but in most rich houses one of the rooms round this court is also a reception-room, of which the walls are entirely covered with marble mosaic and gilding, a fountain at one end, a divan at the other ; coloured matting and handsome Persian carpets on the floor, and near the ceiling a row of windows, latticed with pierced marble or carved wood in patterns of fairy intricacy and lightness ; the ceilings are always of wood most delicately carved, painted, and gilt. A closed door in this court leads by a little passage into a third court, much the same, only handsomer than the others, where the ladies reside, and beyond which they do not come in. Mooslim houses. The houses are mostly two stories high, but some have only one, the flat roof forming as usual the promenade ; in Damascus the roofs of the hareem are generally covered with lattice or torn mats and green creepers.

One Saturday Mr. and Mrs. Robson were kind enough to take us to see some of the best houses of Damascus, which now generally belong to Jews. On this day they sit dressed in their finest clothes and jewels to receive visitors ; at the first house we visited, a large family were assembled round a widowed mother. The eldest daughter, who had been married four years and was not quite eighteen, was very tall and slender, with a complexion as white as snow : her black hair and large bright eyes and small mouth made a beautiful face, though the highly-arched eyebrows they all have (a painted line drawn after the hair is pulled out) add to the silly, inane expression of their faces. This girl was very lively, and never ceased asking questions and chattering, showing us all her ornaments, which were chiefly diamonds and pearls, on her head, neck, and arms. All the ladies were dressed in Manchester muslin skirts of bright colours, and short silk or velvet jackets embroidered in gold; sky-blue and bright green seemed the favourite mixture of colours. The neck and bosom of each was covered, not concealed, by embroidered muslin, the skin underneath being frequently painted. On the death of the father, the house and all its contents becomes the property of the son; the mother remains there only on sufferance. In this one the master was only a child of twelve years old, but he exacted much respect from the servants (who sat in the room, by the bye, all the time, below the divan, and joined loudly in the conversation), and he was very finely dressed, wearing several diamond and turquoise rings, and an enamelled watch hanging by a pearl chain. He served us with sweetmeats, making a salaam to each before presenting the spoon, which we returned on giving it back: and after he had passed on, each one made another salaam to his mother, the mistress of the house. They took us over the whole house, which is extremely handsome, no portion left unornamented, and all done in the finest inlay of coloured marbles, as delicate as any Florentine table: this is the old and good style—in the new houses this is only imitated in paint, put on by a pierced form—mere stencilling, in short.

The little son conducted us then to his grandfather's—a still larger and handsomer house, with four or five large courts and splendid apartments. Here also even the upper apartments were very beautifully decorated, which is not usually the case, their ornament being generally confined to a little painting. The women in this house were very ugly, but gaily dressed; a troop of romping boys and pretty girls burst in, however, the girls wearing very handsome belts of filagree gold bosses sewed on velvet and set with jewels,—the handsomest of these come from Baghdad.

But the finest house we visited belonged to a Jew named Lisbona—a handsome, portly man, who was sitting on the divan without shoes or stockings, chanting Hebrew from a big book on his knee. He was very jolly and talkative, and called to his wife and mother to join us: they apologised much for not being able to offer us coffee, as being the Sabbath they could not light a fire; and then made a close examination of our dresses, &c. The old mother wore a widow's head-dress, a black keftiyeh thrown over and concealing the indispensable gold coins, and a huge bunch of short, black ostrich feathers laid on each side of the head and face; a large black tassel hanging from the back of her head, below which an immense number of stout black silk cords and tassels reached nearly to the ground—making altogether a heavy and really ponderous affair, only useful as a sort of domestic portable hearse of the ugliest description—so unlike our pretty, modest, English widow's cap. They showed us numbers of pretty things—nargilehs, zarfs, sugar-stands, &c. &c.—all in the finest silver filagree, so much better made than anything we had seen in the bazaars that we begged Lisbona to tell us the maker's name, intending to buy some; but nothing would induce the excellent Jew to answer anything of the kind until he had inquired again and again from each of us, and entreated Mr. Robson to assure him of the fact, “Have you got money enough to pay for them? Are you sure you have money enough?" and when that was settled, he turned coolly to me and said, "Then why do you wear that common thing on your shoulders? You have got a beautiful dress—why don't you wear a nice shawl too?" My dress was of stout English cotton print; but I had put on a pretty silk shawl which had been given to me in Beyrout, and which, being of native manufacture, displeased his sense of propriety, and made him think I was too poor to have anything better; of course I did not mention that my dress cost about a sixth part of its price, and was intended for use, not beauty; but we took the hint, and never paid another visit dressed in Arab manufactures. These good people took a lively interest in us and our adventures; but the women pestered us with ceaseless questions as to what we had done with our husbands—where we had left them—what could have induced them to let us go so far without them; and I do not think they were ever persuaded that we had none; though, finally, the old woman ran after us, emphatically entreating us, "Oh, maiden! oh, maiden! if you really have not got a husband, do let me send for such-and-such a marriage-merchant from the bazaar!"

The prettiest thing in that house was a fair sweet-faced boy in a side room, with one hand rocking a cradle containing a fat pretty baby, and holding in the other a fine Hebrew Psalter, from which he was chanting aloud. The cradle was of polished walnut wood inlaid with mother-of-pearl, and had "Peace and happiness," in Arabic, on each side. Lisbona and all the other Jews, on hearing that we were "Ingleez," immediately inquired after Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore, and, without paying any attention to the answer that we did not know them, sent scores of salaams and compliments to them to be delivered without fail.

Then we went to a much smaller house belonging to a Christian merchant, M. Freije, a rich and excellent man, with a lovely wife handsomely dressed, and wearing a pretty soufah, the same head-dress as that worn by the Maronite women of the Lebanon, but still handsomer: she had about 3000 bits of gold fastened to it. She was busy superintending her household affairs, mounted on the pattens, some ten inches high, worn by every Damascus lady, but finding us curious in pretty things, she kindly went to her coffers and brought out several splendid dresses and velvet jackets embroidered in gold,—the embroidery on one jacket alone had cost 12*l.*; she also showed us quantities of antique silver vases, zarfs, &c., and exquisite egg-shell and Persian china. Their house was being newly ornamented—not painted, but an inlay of jet-black marble upon white; it had rather a sombre appearance, although beautifully done, and was very much mixed with mirror and gilding—the present taste at Damascus, but which does not, I think, harmonise well with the marbles. Then we went to see some Mooslims in a beautiful house, known to many travellers from its having been the hotel for some few years; the rooms were splendidly decorated with marble mosaic and incrustation of gilding, and the very large court was made lovely, like another of the houses we had seen, with several small jets d'eau, besides the large fountain, and a variety of fruit trees and beds of flowers festooned together with thick wreaths of convolvulus major; the divans and hangings in the different rooms were all of the rich Damascus brocaded silk, some of them embroidered with gold, and the doors of the rooms were beautifully inlaid with mother-of-pearl.

An immensity of screaming to the unveiled women to get out of the way ensued on our appearance at the door: however, Mr. Robson being disposed of and imprisoned in one of the rooms, we were admitted, and found the lady of the house and a beautiful daughter of fifteen, both enormously fat, attired only in gowns and loose trousers of thin pink muslin, through which their stout brown limbs did look remarkably odd; they were at breakfast, and would take no refusal but that we must sit down too,—so we were placed on little stools round the low koorsee, or table, on which the tray was placed, and took a few mouthfuls of the fruits, the pilafs looking too greasy to be pleasant for one's fingers.

We spent a good deal of time in the bazaars, wishing to buy many things as specimens of Damascus manufacture, and I never tired, mentally, of watching the endless variety of faces, figures, costumes, and objects in the long, long alleys; then, too, the purchase of each article took as much time as buying a house full of things at home would have taken,—I often wished one's home friends could have had Prince Cheri's telescope to see us, in our English dresses, sitting duly doubled up beside the well-turbaned, richly-dressed merchant, on his little counter, in solemn conclave over the price of a silk dress or a pot of confiture, or, refreshing ourselves after the fatigue of each purchase with a saucer of pink ice and a cup of delicious coffee.

Most of the dresses made and sold at Damascus are of cotton, with the pattern thrown up in silk; many of the patterns are Oriental, but some of the prettiest are European,—these are about 2*l.* 5*s.* the dress; those of unmixed silk reach to any price, and are all of them costly; some are beautiful things, especially those which, like the scarfs, have silver thread woven in one way and gold thread the other. They make some good woollen articles, besides an immense variety of coarse stuffs of camels' and goats' hair.

Many of the bazaars are lofty stone buildings, handsomely vaulted; some, less modern and less commodious, are more picturesque, as the Greek Bazaar; but the most interesting of all are the Shoe Bazaar, the Goldsmiths', and the Carpenters' Bazaar, in all of which ancient columns, half obscured by the booths, and beautiful vistas of arches, meet the eye at every step. The finest building in the bazaars is the khan As'sad Pasha,—a model of that graceful, simple energy of style, which is the best characteristic of the pure Saracenic architecture; the interior is a square of three domes around a large and lofty central dome, supported on square piers; these domes are pierced with windows, and the whole building is of alternate rows of black and white marble—ornament enough in itself; the goods of the merchants are ranged on the marble floor round the sides of the square, and a large fountain occupies the centre; nothing can be a finer study for an artist than the endless variety of bright-coloured costumes and goods grouped on the ground, contrasted with the grave severity of the black and white bands, while the slanting lines of sunshine fall in dazzling rays athwart the dark shadows of the pillars and recesses under the nine domes. The khan is entered by a splendid doorway, as fine a specimen as can be found of the rich fretwork and interlacings, slender columns and mosaics, for which Saracenic architecture has no rival. This khan is modern, but there is nothing of pure Saracenic more beautiful in Damascus.

Of course the Great Mosque of the Khalif 'Walêd — once the Christian cathedral of the city — is the most interesting and beautiful of all; it is extremely difficult to see, as no Christian foot is allowed to cross the threshold, and they are very jealous of Christians even looking in; it would, therefore, be quite incomprehensible without Mr. Porter's plan, connecting the court of cloisters with the colonnades hidden in the bazaars; a hasty glimpse in passing by the outer gates is all the view one can obtain of the inside; of the outside, likewise, only a few fragments are visible, but these are beautiful; the upper part of a large gateway can be seen from the roof of one of the bazaars, which is delicately executed and in better taste, because not overloaded, than any of the work on the Temple of Jupiter at Baalbek; from another roof the capitals of several columns can be seen—they are in the purest and loveliest style of Greco-Roman art. Peeping in through some gates one can see the noble cloistered quadrangle, surrounded by Corinthian columns, and an exquisite fountain in Saracenic style in the centre; the gates themselves are of brass of very good workmanship, still bearing the figure of the Sacramental chalice, now placed amid Arabic inscriptions, the additions of later years. The head of St. John the Baptist is believed to be really still in existence in the crypt of this church. May the day come — and that soon — when, in both Santa Sophia at Constantinople and in this Church of St. John at Damascus, the worship of Christ shall be re-established to endure throughout all generations, when the mists and veils that now darken the hearts of both Jew and Gentile shall have been torn away! For two thousand years the inscription (in Greek) on this portal has announced that "Thy kingdom, O Christ, is an everlasting kingdom, and Thy dominion endureth throughout all generations,"—the Arabs believe that the time is at hand when Christianity will be proclaimed throughout the land, and Christian governors rule there; and we, too, look forward to the time when the Lord shall have "made bare His holy arm in the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God." *

Standing on that roof, with these thoughts in one's mind, there was nothing more beautiful in our eyes than to look down at the crowded bazaar beneath one's feet, and to see, gliding quickly through the crowd of self-satisfied Mooslims, dark reserved Jews, wild Bedouen, and savage Kurds—the white cap and simple blue gown of a Sister of Charity: wherever one went one saw them, generally in couples, hastening along with a basket on one arm containing medicine and food, administered alike to Jew, Turk, Heretic and Infidel; every one who spoke of them used but words of admiration and respect. One day we went to see their abode, and found ourselves admitted to an elderly, happy-looking sweet-faced Mother, who told us that they had arrived—six of them—on that day five years in Damascus, without any house having been prepared for them. Slowly and surely, with brave and pure hearts, they had laboured on, and much have they effected in those few years: now they have a well-built but substantial building for their Convent, rough but clean and neat, containing seventeen Sisters, two of whom are Arabs, and a school of about 150 children, besides many day-scholars, including Mooslims and Jewesses, and one Metouaalee. We heard these children

* Isaiah lii. 10.

read, well and intelligently, in some religious book, and saw their excellent writing. They were very clean and tidy, and remarkably well-behaved and happy-looking. Their dormitory, with rows of simple mattresses laid on the floor, their kitchens and play-grounds, were all perfectly arranged. Bread, olives, and thin soup was their food, all of which the children learned to prepare. The upper classes were well advanced in French, and embroidered beautifully—an accomplishment which would insure their future support. It is impossible to see a more pleasing and interesting institution; and, for the first time in Damascus, one felt some hope of anything being accomplished towards the Christianising of the people. Well may English people blush, overwhelmed with shame, when we see such self-sacrificing and successful work, and remember that our Church has done nothing, absolutely nothing, in Syria.* I have said that the French have established missions and schools throughout the country,—but God knows there is work enough and room enough for both to labour,—and where are ours?—a few excellent, hard-working men, sent out by the Presbyterians of Scotland and Ireland, are all that Great Britain has ever contributed to the land that gave birth to St. Paul and the Apostles. If they had stopped at home, what would have become

* In Palestine a mission has been established at Jerusalem for the Jews, but throughout the rest of the land the English are believed to be destitute of religion, and no sign of their worship appears in the length or breadth of the country to contradict the assertion. Even in Beyrout, where Englishmen congregate for commerce, and where numerous English travellers are continually passing and repassing, and where a Consulate (with now a Consul-general) has long been established, there is not a single clergyman to call them together, and not the slightest thing marks the observance of the Lord's day, or their remembrance of Him, in the land once sanctified by His presence.

of us, and how would the Gentiles have found salvation? Has England no yearning of love for the land of her Saviour? no debt of gratitude to pay back to the country whence her redemption came, and which lies now shrouded in mists of thick darkness? Let us imitate the zeal of our neighbours, and take example by the sagacity and liberality with which their missions are conducted: it is such poor, pitiful work to send a man, single-handed, here, and another there, and bid them "convert the land," while experience has indeed taught how little (or rather nothing) the most devoted efforts can thus accomplish here: if anything is ever to be effected, it must be by an organised body, whose labours may be directed simultaneously to the wants of body as well as soul,—feeding, clothing, as well as teaching and civilising the natives: thus, and thus alone, may we, with God's blessing, look for some results.

The English Consul, Mr. Brant, from whom, as old friends, we received the kindest possible attentions, lives in a beautiful house, of the old Damascus style, in the Mooslim quarter; the same house has been occupied for many years as the English Consulate, and has been over and over described — perhaps its chief charm is in the large size of the court and the tank in the middle, besides the remarkable variety of the trees and shrubs planted there — several kinds of acacia, orange, lemon, oleander, Japan meddlar, varieties of roses and myrtle (on the perfumed berries of which I made my luncheon), besides a great many other shrubs. The large reception-room is very handsomely inlaid and carved, the cost of which, even many years ago, the Consul said must have been 8000*l*. — now that everything is so much dearer and labour so much more expensive, it would cost three or four times that sum: — with all this fine orientalism around one, it was curious to see English curtains and table-cloths, to hear English music on an English piano, and to eat a thoroughly English dinner two thousand miles away from home: these things have a value we cannot understand until we have been out of England for a good long time: and I confess I was rather surprised to find how much I too enjoyed them.

One special pleasure Mr. Brant was so kind as to obtain for us, was the permission to visit the renowned Abd-el-Khader*, and we went to his house one day, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Brant. We were taken first into the hareem, where Mrs. Brant interpreted in Turkish, which the first lady of the hareem speaks. She was sitting alone in a grand reception-room on a cotton quilt, with a dress of thick wadded quilting, and loads of white muslin folded round her head — the only handsome thing she wore was a gold tissue scarf round her waist. She was old, stout, and very ugly — but it is said that her husband has a great respect and regard for her, and that, although he consoles himself for the decay of her charms by those of many others, he always treats her with much affection, telling her his plans and consulting her about what he does: perhaps her being an Algerian Bedoueen, like himself, is an unfading charm in his eyes. She was suffering much from rheumatism, and said Damascus was a dreadful place, it was so cold nearly all the year. The younger females remove into the country to some of his gardens in the summer, but this one remains in the city. Her son, a boy of twelve years old, came in and sat on his heels beside her; she seemed very fond and proud of him, appealing to him about his father, of whom he spoke simply as “Abd-el-Khader:” we were told that they drop the expression of relationship in the case of a very distinguished person. The room was an odd jumble—the Damascene form and fountain furnished with French hangings, and filled with French china and ornaments: so indeed is the whole palace, and nothing can be brighter, gayer, or in worse taste; the Damascene patterns, so pretty and so suitable in their place, are spoiled by the mixture, and utterly absurd are the French daubs of European ideas misapplied upon the Oriental walls—for instance, the lower part of the walls of one room, which would have been naturally a beautiful inlay of marble mosaic harmonising with the marble floor, was here replaced by painted views of Buddhists' Pagodas, peopled with French shepherdesses and Marquises, placed in the same accurate perspective as appears on the famous willow-leaf plate of long memory. Abdel-Khader is greatly, and naturally, blamed by his Algerian followers for having so entirely discarded the Bedoueen in himself, and above all for wearing the dress of a Damascene merchant,—it may be said that it is very fine to see him contented and making the best of his exile, and that it is wiser to “do in Rome what Romans do,” but it does seem strange that he should carry the signs and characteristics of his long French imprisonment about with him, and thrust it upon the Orientalism with which he is surrounded, and which is natural to him;—however, we understood that France is not a very palatable subject of conversation in the house, and of course we did not allude to it in any way.

* Which means, “Servant of the Powerful One.”

The old wife appeared to keep up no kind of ceremony or etiquette, though she is said to be a severe and rigid matron over the younger wives; her slaves were all negresses, dressed in a single garment of pink cotton, and each had a nose-ring with one turquoise passed through the wide flat nostril, looking exactly like a forget-me-not dropped on a bank of black mud; they stood at the lower end of the room, below the divan, chatting among themselves and laughing at our conversation, while they finished the sweetmeats we had left uneaten. We went into other rooms to see some younger wives of the Chief and those of his sons—one of whom was extremely pretty, like a tiny wax doll, with pink cheeks, coral lips, black hair, and eyes that were half closed over by magnificent eyelashes, sweeping the cheek; it is said that he buys a new wife every quarter, and that he once replied to an English gentleman at Broussa, who asked him why he had so many wives, that he did not know how he could better expend French money than on such frivolous luxuries! * They are chiefly Circassians, but all those whom we saw were the smallest, most delicately-made little creatures possible.

After taking leave of the Hareem we joined the gentlemen of our party in a marble-floored hall, daubed round with French figures, and the comfortable Oriental divan exchanged for hard French sofas, on one of which Abd-el-Khader was sitting in European fashion. He came forward to meet us, and we were greatly struck with his appearance: he has a tall, majestic figure, fair skin, grey hair—that once was black—a long, white beard, a forehead and keen piercing eye which could nowhere be passed unmarked. I never saw more intellect marked in the one, nor a more truly eagle expression in the other,—as one of our party afterwards admirably described him: “His every look is that of a prince, born and accustomed to command, acting upon promptly-formed judgment—in one word, a Leader—this is one's first impression; afterwards you see he is a man of high intellect, loving thought for its own sake—a Mooslim Athanasius, who would no more brook a mystery than an insult, but with the keen blade of his intellect would cut the difficult knot, throwing the whole weight of his ability on whichever side he took up, and stopping all discussion on it with the neatness of a logical formula." Abd-el-Khader is a man of much learning; he has written four large and profound treatises on Controversy, Philosophy, and the Cosmogony of the world; and he himself gives the daily theological lecture in the Great College at Damascus; his court is crowded every day and all day with persons soliciting audience of him, so that it is difficult to find him for even a moment at leisure; it is said that his Algerian followers are daily, but secretly, increasing round him, and doubtless the last acts of his history are by no means played out; a noble incident of that life has occurred since the above was written. England and France will ever remember his conduct during the massacres in the spring of 1860; it was not love for France, but the humanity of his enlightened mind and the fervent respect which he felt in his heart for the defenceless Sisters of Charity, which made him sally forth to their rescue, at the head of his own wild followers; nor would he have been a whit less forward to aid and support the subjects of England, if the firm high character and unflinching conduct of the British Consul had not been protection and defence enough in itself.

* He has an income of 4000*l.* a year allowed him by the French.

Abd-el-Khader is regarded as a sovereign, and respected as a man of sanctity by all Mooslims; therefore, when visiting Jerusalem some time ago, he occupied a small suite of rooms in the Mosque of the Moghrebîns, a very holy place, and, one day when the British Consul was paying a visit to the Pacha of Jerusalem, Abd-el-Khader was announced : the Pacha went to the door to meet him, and bowed down to the ground before him ; he stayed but a very few minutes, and the Pacha accompanied him to the threshold, and there again prostrating himself to the very floor, he kissed the hem of his garment, which Abd-el-Khader did not withdraw, but, lifting up his hand, he stood there and addressed the Pacha in a sort of speech or sermon : “ I call upon you, oh Pacha ! to remember what a responsible and important position you occupy ; never forget how great is your duty, and how immense an account will one day be required of you for all the power bestowed upon you ; fail not in any particular of your manifold duties ; remember to give alms to the poor, to do justice to the widow, and to succour the oppressed,”—and much more, the Pacha standing the whole time humbly before him, with folded hands and downcast eyes, in the attitude of a slave. Considering the high rank of the Pacha of Jerusalem, this scene was a very curious one.

CHAP. XV.

THE QUEEN OF THE DESERT.

“ The hue of youth upon a brow of woe,
Which men called old two thousand years ago !
Match me such marvel, save in Eastern clime—
A rose-red city,—half as old as time ! ”

BURGON.

PART I.—THE JOURNEY.

THE world-famous ruins of Palmyra are naturally a common subject of conversation at Damascus, and although we had never entertained a serious thought of reaching them, believing it to be quite out of our power, we made many inquiries respecting them from the Consul and other people ; and, one day, Mr. Robson, the excellent missionary, and his wife showed us a portfolio of drawings, conveying so grand an idea of the magnificence and glorious beauty of the ruins, that we were seized with the most intense desire to see them for ourselves : however, the more we asked about the journey, the more entirely impossible it seemed for us to accomplish it ; the fatigue and expense combined made it out of the question.

Now there happened to be some other travellers staying in the hotel, who were also very anxious to go to Palmyra, and among them, happily for us, the famous artist, M. Carl Haag, to whom we recounted the beauty of the drawings we had seen, and he too went to see them next day ; he came back still more enthusiastic about the original objects than we had been. "If I am a ruined man all my life, or if I walk there in Bedoueen sandals, I must go to Palmyra!" he kept repeating all that evening. So we all agreed to see whether anything could be managed for us, and the following day Mr. and Mrs. Robson took us to see the Sheikh of the Anazèh, who makes all the arrangements whenever any one does go to Palmyra.

It must be explained that the fatigue of this expedition arises from the fact, that no one has been allowed for many years to remain at the ruins more than twenty-four hours; twenty is the usual time: of course you must be almost inhumanly strong if you can make the long journey there and back, fifty hours of camel riding, and not spend those twenty hours in sleep or rest,—while, as the ruins are three miles in extent, no one could take more than a glance at the principal objects, even if ten hours were spent in traversing them; and as the fear of Bedoueen ghuzoos, and the want of water, necessitate riding that part of the journey nearest to Palmyra at a stretch of twenty-four hours without stop or stay, both going and returning, few persons like to undertake it. Then the fee given to the tribe for allowing travellers to go there with safe-conduct, is usually 30%. each. We came, however, at a fortunate moment; the Anazeh tribe were encamped close round the ruins, and there was nothing to fear when once we had reached them. The Sheikh was immensely impressed with M. Haag's eagerness, and with the conviction that all the world would soon know from his drawings what a glorious place Palmyra is; and the Anazehs really love and value the ruins; and so, to cut a long story short, after many days spent in consulting and debating, with various pros and cons, he engaged to let us stay five whole days, and, if all the party in the hotel joined together, at the price of 15*l.* a head: he engaged to choose good dromedaries for us (on which all one's comfort, and therefore strength depend), for which we paid 2*l.* each extra. It was also a golden opportunity of seeing a real, true Bedoueen tribe in the desert, and we were promised to go among them as the Sheikh's guests, and live upon camel's milk and flesh, &c.

So, to our own infinite astonishment, as well as pleasure, it was really all settled—with two days allowed us in which to make arrangements for our departure, on Friday the 7th October, after the Mosque prayers. Our little dog was consigned to the care of the cook, with the baggage—all unnecessary ornaments safely deposited therein, that no sparkle of gold might tempt the passing Arab; and we spent the morning stuffing our saddle-bags with a change or two of linen, drawing materials, and one book each: stout cotton dresses were put on instead of riding habits, the provisions were stowed in the dragoman's saddle-bags, and we started on foot for the Sheikh's house, outside one of the gates of the city—the Bab Tuma. The Sheikh was ready in his scarlet cloak and mash'lah, and having hooded his falcon—an indispensable companion—he took us to the court, where, indeed, was a scene of Babelar confusion; eleven dromedaries were on their knees, all roaring, and growling, and groaning, as if they were being killed, after the manner of dromedaries the moment they are requested to kneel, and the whole time they are kneeling; all the camel-drivers and armed escort rushing about screaming and shouting—flocks of poultry at one side shrieking, gabbling, and cackling—pet gazelles were hiding in a corner—and a number of beautiful Arab mares were standing transfixed with astonishment at the unwonted crowd and noise. Our minds were soon concentrated upon the art of mounting! quite an ordeal for a novice, and on the first success of which, the Arab prophesies whether you will make a good rider or not, and be worthy of his beloved beast. A couple of men held down each dromedary by standing on its fore-knees, while the Sheikh himself lifted us ladies, each with a sort of flying jump, into the middle of the seat, hastily settling our shawls, &c.; and while directions were shouted on all sides, with such earnest vociferation that it was impossible to understand one syllable of them except to "hold fast!" up jumped the animal, raising his hind legs first, when you go nearly over his nose,—then his forelegs, jerking you as unexpectedly backwards against the hinder pommel of your saddle, and affording you a knock on your spine that you remember against all future occasions.

By four o'clock we had all streamed in procession out of the gate—a goodly cavalcade of eleven dromedaries, besides the Argeels, their owners, who always accompany the camel, sometimes on foot, sometimes mounted behind the riders. The dromedaries carried our party, including the servants, the Sheikh, and the escort of armed Bedouens, Anazehs, and others—thirteen men in all; while several Damascus acquaintance accompanied us for a mile or two, after the kindly Arab fashion of leave-taking. Such a noise as we made altogether, for the Bedouens had a darabouka (a drum) to which they sang lustily, shouting their good-byes on all sides, the whole way through the delightful gardens and green lanes that encompass the city. In two hours and a half we reached the village of Doumah, which stands on the edge of the gardens: it was all alive with men and women gathering the grapes, and spreading them out so thickly on the ground to dry into raisins, that we took them for red carpets; while many were crowding round the fires, by the aid of which they were turning the sweet juice into dibs—a luscious sweet in which the Arabs delight, and which is so often mentioned in the Bible, rendered, in our translation, honey. From this we passed out upon the great plain, and presently met the Baghdad postman galloping in at the end of his nine days' journey.

The sun went down at a little before seven; then suddenly the Sheikh uttered a command, and down went all the camels. "This is our halting place for the night," said he. "What, here—on the road? Shall we not go a little on one side and look for some shelter?" "Oh, no," said the Sheikh, "this is the best, for here we can see who comes, and we have to look out for robbers!" It did look astonishingly bare and strange for a night's rest; but, in a few moments, the dragomans had arranged our carpets, thick wadded couvertures, cloaks, &c.; the fire was quickly lighted, made of the dry thorns which grew all around us, and the kettle was boiling; cold fowl and hot tea was presented: then the camels were arranged, lying down in an external circle—the falcon unhooded, and placed upon his perch—the saddle frames built up into a wall, and our saddlebags placed under our heads—the resolution was carried, nemine contradicente, that the Desert was both cheerful and comfortable—and before eight o'clock nearly all the party were giving loud and vigorous tokens of a profound sleep. My sister and I, however, were too new to sleeping à la belle étoile, and on so very hard a couch as that rocky road, to find rest easily, and we were much amused too in seeing a camel, every now and then, get up and hobble about with his one leg tied up close under him, till, finding he could gain but little by such limping amusement, he would lie down again and snore. Twice the practised ear of Sheikh Miguel gave the alarm of thieves, and prevented their approach.

Amongst the Bedoueens, stealing on a large scale, involving danger and risk—such as coming by night into an encampment and silently making away with the camels—is not considered disgraceful; but all stealing from one another's tents, without danger, is considered entirely mean and bad; so bad that the punishment is cutting off the hand. The greatest punishment for grave crimes is beheading with a sword: for all lesser things, such as stealing a camel, &c., branding with a hot iron is the usual punishment. False accusations are always punished by the infliction of whatever punishment would have been awarded to the accused if proved guilty.

The Bedoueens can be plentifully cool in their naïve impudence. Our good Sheikh had a little black negro boy—a slave—with him, whom he was taking to the tribe, thinking the winter in Damascus too cold for him; he had lately been ill, and the kind-hearted Sheikh got up early in the night, and taking off a cloak lined with fur, that he had to sleep on, wrapped it round the child; in the morning it was found that one of the Bedoueens had quietly appropriated it for himself as soon as the Sheikh had gone to sleep again. Of course this Bedoueen was not an Anazeh; our escort was purposely composed of Bedoueens of several of the minor tribes and villagers inhabiting this Desert, as the best security for our protection.

A few words about our friend Sheikh Miguel * may not be uninteresting: his eldest brother, Muhammad, is the head Sheikh of the Mizrâb, one branch of the Sab'a, a powerful division of the Anazehs; he is himself of equal rank with his brother, but Muhammad always remains with the tribe, while Sheikh Miguel does all their business with the Government, and escorts travellers, for which purpose he lives part of the year in Damascus. He is—like all true Bedouins—a small man, about five feet three inches in height, slightly made, but erect, very graceful in all his motions, and with a light, easy step; his face is really beautiful—of a perfect oval—a long aquiline nose, delicately formed mouth, small regular teeth of dazzling whiteness, and large black eyes that could be soft and sweet as any woman's, or flash with a fierce, wild, eagle glance that really made one start. He wore a short black beard, and long crisp ringlets under his kefiyeh, which was of the very finest and brightest Damascus silk, bound round his head with the pretty ak'hal—a double wreath of camels' hair tied and tasselled with coloured silks. His dress was a kumbaz, or long, tight gown of striped and flowered silk, with wide, open sleeves hanging down to the knee; then his Sheikh's cloak or pelisse of bright scarlet cloth bound with black braid, and three bars of broad black braid across the chest,—this, with the scarlet leather boots, worn over stockingless feet, and reaching to the knee, is the distinguishing dress of the Sheikh: over all came a mash'lah*—a shapeless but very comfortable cloak—sometimes of thin white cloth, edged with colour—sometimes of coarse, thick, brown and white camel's-hair cloth—sometimes of the same material in black,

* Pronounced Midgewell.

* Mash'lah means to throw on.

W.A. Beaufort, del.

M & N Hobbart, lith.

SHEIKH MIGUEL, OF THE ANAZEH TRIBE.

violet, or brown, with a handsome pattern in gold thread woven in upon the shoulders—this latter kind comes from Mekka, and are costly but very beautiful. A silk scarf wound many times round the waist, into which a couple of revolvers and a big knife were stuck, and a sword hung round the neck by a crimson cord, completed his costume. As to his manners the “best-bred” polished English gentleman is not more polished than he, and the Bedouen chief joins an easy chivalrous grace to his quiet dignified demeanour, which has a double charm. From the moment we left Damascus and became his “charge” till we re-entered the city, his kindness and thoughtful attention never ceased—morning, noon, and night, travelling or stationary, whatever we might be doing, alone or surrounded with Arabs, he had an eye and an ear always ready for every want of ours; whatever little difficulty might arise, the Sheikh was sure to be at hand to help one out of it. His conversation—of course through an interpreter—was always full of interest, and more might be learned from him, I imagine, than from any one, of the ancient histories of the great Arab tribes, of which so little is known; he and his brothers had all been taught reading and writing, but he told us, as people say of vaccination, “they only took with me.” His Bedouens and the escort addressed him occasionally with “O Sheikh!” but most often it was “O Miguel!” and they talked and joked with him with a freedom that was sometimes rather annoying to us, for they never hesitated to interrupt any of our conversation with him, whenever they had a remark to make. At home in their tents they observe some etiquettes; when the Sheikh enters every person rises, and stands till he bids them be seated, and they do not permit him, when encamped, to do any menial work ; but out in the plain, a Sheikh would be greatly despised who made any difference between himself and his people, or did not attend to his own camel, and eat the same food as the others. The office of Sheikh is entirely hereditary, but a very bad or insane heir is set aside, and either the next of blood, or some one remarkably distinguished by his prowess, is elected in his place.

The Sheikh awoke us all at sunrise on the following morning ; our toilettes, which consisted chiefly of shaking ourselves, were soon performed, and our breakfast of fowl, bread, and tea, was likewise quickly despatched. We were all mounted and away by seven o'clock, and soon came to some ruins of an extensive khan and a tower, whence we turned up the low pass of the Anti-Lebanon mountains, called the Bourghaz—or passage—rather slippery and steep for camels. Their movements, either in ascending or descending, are very unpleasant to the rider ; they make each step like a stumble, jerking up or down upon it, shaking you all through, and helping you to arrive at the camel's own opinion, when he was asked which was best for him to go, up hill or down, and he answered, "May the curse of Allah light on both ! for the flat plain is the only place fit for a beast like me !" We here met a great number of donkeys with long planks of timber lashed to their sides, and as they dragged these loads over the rocky ground, the roaring noise they made was perfectly astonishing, and much alarmed the dromedaries, who are very timid creatures, and are therefore very unpleasant to ride past unusual sights or sounds, or in towns at night. We passed the ruins of a temple, four columns and a sarcophagus, and of some wells excavated in the rock with much care.

Descending on the other side we were in the Desert, here narrowed between mountains to a valley of, we were told, ten miles wide. I need not say that our eyes were not of the smallest use in judging of any distance in the Desert; the atmosphere is so clear and so heated that objects at many miles off may appear quite close to you, and it is an ever-recurring marvel why one goes on hours and hours and never seems to approach any nearer to the objects you have been looking at all the time. Another deception, which is frequently puzzling, is the magnifying of distant objects by the heat, so that a few tamarisk bushes look like a grove of trees, a horse seems a tall camel, and a camel looks like a walking tower. The Sheikh had some business to transact at a large khan which had for some two hours seemed under our feet, called Kuteifeh, and we had therefore the advantage of an hour and a half's rest on our carpets in the inner court; he despatched his business and said his prayers in the Mosque, while we ate our luncheon, which was a sumptuous one, for we had nice cool oranges and fine raisins bought in the khan. Senân Pacha built this khan about three centuries ago, a handsome, solid building, with rows of fine arches: some houses have gathered round it into a small village, and there are gardens with pleasant trees, under whose shade we passed in leaving the place. Our course lay now nearly due east, and we soon crossed the track to Aleppo and Homs, which here turns off to the north. Our camels became very troublesome this afternoon, stopping to browse on certain aromatic plants which appeared on the plain, and as you have no particular bridle, and camels are remarkably self-willed, and reluctant to take advice in a language they don't understand, you have to sit still and bear it; but it is a very odd sensation, when their heads disappear entirely under their bodies, and their long fore-legs go walking on over their own heads! after which they suddenly pull up these same heads, and look round in your face with such a meek expression of injured innocence, you are obliged to say, "All right, good drom., only do go on." The drivers make them go on capitally, either by requesting them to do so in the politest Arabic, or by enforcing their wishes with the bakoūrah (a hooked stick), as they sit behind you: but when the driver is walking, your puny efforts of persuasion are ludicrously unsuccessful: mine were remarkably so, for my heel did not quite reach the neck of the beast, a good kick upon which tells him he is to quicken his pace, and no infliction of my bakourah ever had the faintest effect upon his mind or legs; indeed, at last it became rather a favourite joke among the Argeels to see the "little Sitt" beating on her camel with impotent fury. I had the most charming dromedary, a dear beast, whose sweetness was described in her name, "Helweh" (which means sweet),—she had the easiest, most elastic step, and the most delightful trot in the world; but, to counterbalance Helweh's charms, my driver was a horrid old man, who would not walk much, and therefore was always sitting behind me and continually going to sleep, and, whenever he did so, his dirty head would drop on my shoulder, and get very roughly shaken off. He was, besides, the most garrulous old gentleman, and considered his conversation worth hearing; so, whenever I was speaking to any one of the party, or that the interpreter was telling anything particularly interesting, this old man elevated his hoarse voice and began a speech to another of his brethren, always choosing the furthest off that he might shout the louder. One day I was so angry that I knocked him over the head with my bakourah and told him to "hold his tongue," having learned to make the request in Arabic on purpose: I was rather ashamed of myself, but the other Argeels went into fits of laughter for ever so long, and afterwards they used often to inquire why I did not try him again, with many witticisms about his old head that I did not understand.

My sister's first dromedary was a very spirited, frisky creature, upon seeing which the kind Sheikh dismounted and put her on his own, a gentle black animal, called Simri (black), of which she became very fond, and she had a good, well-behaved young driver, who used to teach her the names of the mountains and the plants, &c., and, when she had repeated her lesson correctly, would call to all the others to come and hear the results of his good teaching. She used sometimes to share her luncheon with him, generally dry bread with a few raisins, and sometimes provided herself with lumps of sugar for him, and once, thinking to give him a treat, she gave him a stick of chocolate, all of which he received with true Arab politeness, and said "taïb, taïb, khatta-herak,"* but he secretly imparted to the interpreter afterwards that she had given him some horrible stuff made of black earth!—this was the chocolate. Whenever we gave them anything they always divided it among the whole set, and seemed grateful and pleased. This is one of the delights of the Bedouen—the true Bedouen—not only that you know you may trust them, and that they are invariably respectful and polite, but that they seem pleased and really grateful for little kindnesses. The Syrian seldom looks pleased, and scarcely ever says "khatta herak."

* "Good, good, thank you."

The falcon-bearer was a true Anazeh, and he always had a good-natured word and an inquiry as to how we felt, whenever either of us came near him: he approved of us mightily because we took to the dromedaries like "ducks to the water," and enjoyed it all from beginning to end. I can well understand the various accounts given by travellers of dromedary riding: the fact is that your liking it depends wholly upon two things—first, the natural pace of your animal—and they all differ in this, more almost than horses; and secondly, the way in which your saddle is settled. The shedād, the substruction of your seat, is simply an inverted V of wood, very smoothly made, with a stout back-bone along the top, at each end of which is placed a pommel about a foot high; fastened to the pommels over the top of the back-bone is an open square frame, stuffed with camel's or goat's hair—this forms your seat: across this, hanging down on each side, you throw first your saddlebags, then a carpet, a wadded quilt, two or three cloaks and shawls, and, in short, as many things as you can heap up,—the more the better, since these coverings make your saddle by day and your bed by night. You sit in the middle of the seat with a leg on each side of the front pommel, varying your position according to your pleasure, and you must lean a little forward always, or your back would rub against the hinder pommel. The saddlebags are two handsome pouches of dark brown camel's hair, adorned with rows of tassels of all manner of bright colours, little tufts of ostrich feathers sewn on here and there, to draw off the "evil eye" from the good things within, and twelve or more long cords hanging from them nearly to the ground, ending in gay-coloured tassels—these keep up a continual swaying when the camel walks, and when he trots they have a very funny appearance.

We had plenty to look at on this our first day in the desert; the mountains on each side were perfectly barren, but they glowed with fine colours,—the ground was riddled with the holes of jerboas and rats whom we sometimes saw running off into safety, and towards evening several pretty gazelles were seen dancing about in the thorns, and among the hashish el kali which covered the ground: this is the plant from the ashes of which they make potash for soap—the Damascus and Jerusalem soap being composed only of this stuff mixed with olive oil;—it is the only trade the Desert Arabs carry on with the city, and the smoke from their fires for burning it, is seen curling up in a dozen different directions at once; it is a dry, thorny, ugly-looking plant. We passed also a very large salt-marsh, glistening and sparkling in the sun as if it was a lake: then came the village of Jerood, and after 10½ hours of riding, independently of our rest at Kuteifeh, we came upon the pretty village of Atny—where there was a stream and a good many trees: we got over a low wall into a small enclosure, where our night encampment afforded unlimited amusement to the villagers until quite late: and we spent a pleasant evening, chatting with the Sheikh over our dinner; some time after a party of ten well-armed men mounted on horseback arrived, whose appearance the Sheikh did not much like; and so, to ensure their not attacking us on the morrow, he engaged them as guards extraordinary, from the dangers of the road to Kuryetēen. This was not a pleasant resting-place for light sleepers,—the jackals prowled round our little enclosure with the most horrible howls and cries—once or twice they leaped over the wall, and I had to throw stones at them to make them go away, and three times I heard, seemingly quite close to us, the horrid yelling laugh of a hyena, which I confess made me feel a little queer.

We had now, too, arrived under the Desert dew, which fell this night so heavily upon us, that in the morning the thick shawls above our couvertures were wet through, and I wrung a great cupfull of water out of a bit of my dress that had unwarily escaped covering in the night. But the curious thing about this Desert dew is that no one ever catches cold from it: the Bedoueens never have rheumatism or coughs from it, and the most delicate travellers encounter it without harm: one of our party had a very weak chest and throat, my sister was very liable to cold, and I to fever, yet we slept exposed to the heaviest dews for fifteen successive nights without taking any remarkable precautions, and we never found the slightest evil result from it.

We started soon after sunrise, our ten new friends accompanying us, making a gay scene in the Desert, as they scoured the plain, ventre à terre, with their white mash'lahs and gaudy kefiyehs streaming in the wind behind them, pursuing one another in mimic warfare, then suddenly wheeling round, pursuer becoming pursued, and sweeping about in quickly changing circles, uttering their war-cries, and poising their long bamboo lances as if to throw them at their enemies, quivering from end to end; these lances are twelve feet long, and are ornamented with bunches of black ostrich feathers at the junction of the bamboo with the long steel point; at the other end is an iron spike, used for planting the lance in the ground when the bearer is dismounted: the horses carry much more trappings than the camels, and their gay-coloured tassels sweep the ground as they gallop along, casting up clouds of sand in the air. They continued this for about a couple of hours, and then, getting tired of the play, galloped on before us, promising to send back a messenger if they found any dangers on the road; the Sheikh had judged rightly, however, and it was fortunate he had engaged them as allies: for on our return we found they had left us to rob three laden mules, and the next day they took possession of the English mail to Baghdad, kept the letters for a time, and appropriated a large portion of Government treasure.

It was terribly hot this morning, and we all suffered a good deal from the burning glare on the barren ground: it was amusing to see how by various degrees, sooner or later, each of us began to leave off looking much about, and gradually retired into his or her kefiyeh, becoming, as the heat increased, more and more transformed into the semblance of mummies; indeed our appearance would have been rather amusing in Hyde Park. I had a silk shawl folded thickly over my shoulders, then the white mash'lah, underneath a very thick, grey tweed cloak with a large hood, and our huge felt hats were covered with some yards of muslin hanging down, kefiyeh fashion, all round, the front part of which could be folded over the face; and in the middle of the day I always bound a blue veil several times over my lips and nose, as the only means of preserving them from blistering. Once or twice we tried to read—easy enough with the dromedary's even step—but the glare was so dazzling on the white page that we always gave it up after a few minutes. We put up two hares, and the Sheikh shooting one, we dismounted in the narrow shade of a low wall of what was once a large khan, called el-Harab—the ruin—and made some coffee while the hare was being roasted whole. Feasting merrily upon its bones, which we handled Arab fashion, we rode on after nearly an hour's delay—an hour that seems very short when it is thus snatched in the middle of a long day's ride for rest — but we forgot all our fatigues in the enchantment of the scene around us; the whole Desert gradually changed into a pale, sweet blue, looking so like the Sea one almost thought it must be water; then the mountains, with their ever-varying crags, became dressed in their evening hues of brightest lilac, purple and violet, tipped with gold, and the deep blue of the sky paled, as streaks of pink and crimson stole over its length and breadth. M. Haag went into raptures, and the Argeels' hearts were evidently softened, for, as the sun sunk, they permitted us the pleasure of a delightful trot in the cool evening air, though they had complained bitterly in the morning, when we wanted to refresh ourselves under the burning sun, that we should "certainly kill the camels," and that we "might as well be a set of postmen at the rate we wanted to go!" The quick trot of a good dromedary is a delightfully easy, pleasant pace, and a great relief after some hours of the monotonous long swing of the walking pace.

The first sight of Kuryeteen was very pretty in the westering sunbeams — the bright specks of the white houses, lying under the mountain side, as they seemed to be, though in reality a long way from them, and, in the distance, the faint blue summits of the mountains over Tadmor — our much-longed-for goal, which was eagerly pointed out by the Argeels; for, be it well understood, Palmyra is but the Italian translation for the "Tadmor-in-the-Wilderness,"* built by King Solomon (Tadmor and Tamar being the Hebrew for a palm), and no one but the European traveller ever gives it such an appellation; the Romans, indeed, called it Adrianopolis, but Tadmor has ever been in all the Eastern world its sole name, and Tadmor, or Tedmor, is it still called by all the Arabs of the "wilderness" around it.

* 1 Kings ix. 18.

It was moonlight ere we reached the large village of Kuryeteen, and as we skirted the outer walls we heard nothing but the loud cries of about a thousand jackals. We were a very long time threading its lanes before we arrived at the Sheikh's house and khan—court within court—each one quickly filled with crowds of his relations and dependants, who came out to see us dismount in the outer court, and then pressed round us, trying to touch our faces and finger our clothes, and asking innumerable questions before we reached the large chamber prepared for us; here, we saw in a moment, the people would be in and out all night—for they were already packing themselves in, in tight rows, to see us eat and sleep; moreover, I felt the lively inhabitants of the mats, carpets and cushions rubbing up their forces for the onslaught, and we therefore quietly escaped to a small terrace on the housetop, where, lifted up above them all, we reposed in perfect silence and quiet after our fourteen hours' journey. Our ten guards of the morning had announced our approach, and the village Sheikh had prepared a banquet for Sheikh Miguel: from our little terrace we looked down into the guest-chamber, where we saw the numerous guests crowding in relays round the enormous pilaf of mutton and rice, a bowl of which was sent up to us with plenty of compliments, from the village Sheikh, on which we made a very good supper.

This Sheikh was a very tall, stout man, large-limbed, and large mouthed,—he was wealthy and prosperous,—but he looked unhappy and depressed: and

Sheikh Miguel soon told us the cause: he had an only son, the delight of his heart, for whom he bought a little black slave as a playmate: the two boys, one day, playing together, got hold of the Sheikh's pistols, and the slave accidentally shot his master's child,—the father, in a transport of blind rage, killed the slave, and was still miserable with grief for his loss.

All Bedoueen Sheikhs have their black slaves, for they are the only servants they can have; no Bedoueen of any tribe will hire himself or herself as servant to any one, and however obliging they may be in lending assistance on some special occasion, the idea of rendering it constantly, or as a duty, would be most indignantly rejected by them all. But these black slaves are always kindly treated, and generally become very much attached and faithful to their owners: we used to see Sheikh Miguel giving his little black boy his food with much care, morning and evening; and the interpreter told us, that the boy was most affectionately attached to the Sheikh, and that if his master was to forget him and give him nothing to eat, he would neither ask for food nor complain, till he starved. They are really valuable servants, and sometimes cost large sums of money: we heard of one, in Damascus, who was so highly esteemed by her dying mistress, that she had left all her children in her entire charge.

The banquet continued long after we had fallen asleep,—so numerous were the guests to welcome the highly-respected Anazeh-chief: these feeds are terrible affairs sometimes to the host, for an Arab invitation includes "you and yours," and your guest, therefore, brings his brother and his cousin, and his cousin's cousin; and when you have invited a party of ten guests you may have forty or fifty, or in fact, any number arrive, all expecting an equal welcome, and, what is worse, an equal share in the food.

We were roused from our slumbers at sunrise, but as the escort were not ready to start till nine o'clock, we might have rested longer: they were baking bread I believe, for their journey, while we stood in the crowd below baking ourselves in the sun. M. Haag made sketches of the faces round us—some superhumanly ugly, but some remarkably pretty: there was a young son of a neighbouring Sheikh, so pretty and so girlish-looking, that we could none of us agree as to whether he was a boy or a girl,—there not being any remarkable difference in the costume at that age; and when I asked him which he was, he blushed every shade of red, and ran away laughing like a mad thing.

This Kuryeteen is a large village with a mixed population of Mooslims and Jacobite Christians—the Sheikh's premises enclosing a rather handsome Mosque, which seemed ancient, and some well-built houses. There are most copious springs and fountains behind the town, which supply innumerable rivulets and streams in the cultivated ground round the houses; they also fill a circular reservoir—a little lakelet—outside the village, where the caravan camels are all watered, surrounded by wild weeds and flowers. From this luxury of water Kuryeteen is believed to be the Hazar-enan, (village or enclosure of fountains—enan answering to the Arabic 'ain) of Numb. xxxiv. 9, 10, describing the north-east corner * of the “promised land;” and again

* According to Mr. Porter, this much-disputed “border” is very simply described: the Mediterranean forms its western extremity, thence the only real valley opening into the eastern country is that of El-Husn, which separates the great chain of the Lebanon mountains (here called Mount Hor, probably some local name applied to one of

by Ezekiel (xlvi. 17) in speaking of the territory promised at some future time to the children of Israel. Here Abraham and Lot probably rested on their way from Haran to the Land of Canaan; and Jacob too, when he came out of Padan-aran with his wives and his children and all his property, to return to Isaac his father; for the natural highway from Mesopotamia into Syria led by the fountains of Tadmor and Kuryeteen.

This was to be our grand day of twenty-four hours' fatigue, and we were all rather put out at our departure being delayed till the sun was high and burning, though not high enough to prevent the view of the long range of blue hills to the south-east from looking lovely as we emerged from the town: such tender and delicate hues one can only see in the Desert. We were now in the Wady el Kebeer (the great valley), which we were told was from twenty to thirty miles wide—its termination was to be Tadmor, and we looked eagerly on to the faint blue distance throughout the day. Very early in the day the Sheikh pointed to a ruined tower on the plain, and said, "We shall halt there:" it seemed quite close to us; but hour after hour we toiled on over the scorched-up, burning, barren ground, where scarce even a thorn was now growing, and we never, never seemed to come any nearer. There was no use in applying to our good Sheikh, for the Bedoueens cannot tell the time or distance of anything; and he invariably answered "Two hours—two hours," to every thing. Before the northernmost peaks) from the Nusairiyeh hills, which end at Antioch; this valley leads directly to Hamah, whence the border came through Zedad and Ziphron to Hazar-enan, "the goings out of it;" these two places are identified by Mr. Porter, with every appearance of probability, as Südüd and Zifroun, villages on the direct track between Hamah and Kuryeteen.

we understood this, it was rather trying to have braced oneself up to hold out the time specified, and then find it might be two, twelve, or any number of hours. No Bedoueens have any idea of dates or times; it is the same with the Druzes and Syrian Fellaheen: "I was born the year so much rain fell;" or, "That happened three years before such a Pasha came;" or something of that kind, are their invariable answers; and in Palestine a Fellāh will tell you, "Oh, my father was quite an old man—he lived in the time of David!"

At length, near sunset, we found ourselves actually close to the tower, and some of us dismounted to examine it, while the dragomans made us a little coffee further on. This place, el Khussar, is called the Robber's Tower, because it is a great place of rendezvous for ghūzoos, or plundering parties, and many an unwary traveller has been seized upon here, and dragged within its crumbling walls. Some fine work is still to be seen on the doorways, windows, and ornamental medallions of the picturesque ruin. The stone of the fallen columns seemed composed entirely of fossils, and we picked out some beautiful little shells with our fingers and penknives. Further on, and in a line with the Robber's Tower, appeared another, at some distance, still more ruined: the remains of a circular reservoir and of an aqueduct are found between them,—the reservoir continuing filled with water for some time after the rainy season, adds another attraction to the Ruined Tower for robbers; our Sheikh therefore kept a sharp look-out while we pledged each other in spiced coffee, and watched our own shadows flying out to endless lengths across the plain, as the sun sunk below the horizon. One has no idea of the beauty and poetry of shadows till one goes into the Desert,—there I never wearied of watching them, and delighting in the new language they talked to me.

The moon rose soon after we mounted again, and the little hasty rest had been so refreshing, that we more than ever enjoyed the night; the camels keep better together than in the day, and the Argeels indulged in a number of wild songs, for the special encouragement of their creatures,—some of the tunes were pretty, wild and sad, though monotonous, and the words poetical,—the chief burden was in the style of “Go on, oh Camel, my love, my beauty, go on quickly, and the prettiest girls of the village shall come out to meet you; go on, and when you kneel, the maidens will feed you with fresh sugar-canes, and stroke you with their soft hands,” &c.; then they improvised verses about the riders, which elicited great applause and some amusement; they were chiefly personal descriptions, which we did not, of course, understand, but sometimes we caught allusions to incidents that had happened in the day, or to things we had said to them in our very meagre Arabic. M. Haag, who dressed like a Bedoueen, and was always full of jokes, was a favourite with them, and the chief songs were about him, with good-natured fun about his continually dropping asleep, &c.; the songs were very pleasant when the singers walked, or when you were listening to your neighbour’s Argeel, but one soon wearied of the loud voices shouting in your very ears at the full crack of their lungs, when they twisted themselves up by the dromedary’s tail, and arrived behind your own shedad: moreover, one was sure to lose, in the row they made, exactly the most interesting part of whatever conversation was going on amongst ourselves,—moreover, whenever one saw two of one’s friends engaged in a comfortable chat, that instant one’s driver was sure to send his camel rushing up, rudely dividing them, for the better arrangement of their own chorus, and one's apologies for the interruption were all the more supremely ridiculous, because we each knew that none of us had the slightest shadow of control over our own beasts.

The singing one day ceased, on their understanding that my sister had a head-ache ; but, on being told the same thing the next day, the dragoman overheard them enquiring from the Sheikh, if the Ingleez women "always had batal" that is, good for nothing "heads!" One must converse, if possible, in night travelling, for else it soon becomes difficult to keep awake, and a tumble from a dromedary is not the pleasantest thing possible ; we were not quite enough at ease to twist back and lie down half behind the pummel as an adept can do, though of course, not when your Argeel is mounted behind you, — but, if one could manage, this it would afford a delightful rest, for the camel's long, swinging, perfectly even step, is the most sleepifying thing in the world, and at night, when you have not even your own shadow to watch, or if you are going eastwards and cannot see it, it really is the hardest thing to keep awake after a long day's ride.

The dromedary's pace is something under five miles an hour. One is apt to imagine it slow, for the stride is so long that they seem tardy, accustomed as one is to the short, quick step of the horse ; but see the quick pace at which the Argeels walk to keep up with them, or, better still, dismount and try, and then see if you don't change your opinion ; if one of the party lags behind or dismounts for only a moment, see how tedious the waiting for him again seems ; or if you yourself lag a little, how soon your companions disappear into moving specks, and how long you are in overtaking them. Some of the dromedaries, especially those selected for the post, go at a wonderfully quick rate, but their gallop is a very rough pace; they cannot endure much of it, and die when at all overworked. Their owners are indeed most attentive to and careful of them; the camel becomes very quickly attached to a kind master, and they are very fond of these their valuable possessions. We found our dromedaries soon became acquainted with us, and would come when called by name to receive chicken bones from our hands; sometimes they roused themselves, and made little observations upon us at night, and at Tadmor I woke more than once feeling my camel gently sniffing at my feet. Their proper food is chiefly barley, but on a journey they ought to have balls made of rice and dhourra mixed up with spices: our men took none of this food with them, expecting to find supplies of it at Tadmor; there was none, however, and except what the poor beasts got in the khans and a few plants by the way, they had nothing whatever to eat, till we returned to Damascus, but the green stalks of the dhourra, which they like, but from which they derive little or no nourishment. Meantime they feed, as the natives say, on their own humps—that is, the humps gradually diminish in size: as long as there is any hump visible the camel can keep on; as soon as it disappears he languishes and dies. Every camel is branded with the mark of his owner and of his tribe, and it sometimes happens an Arab may be travelling among a distant tribe and come upon his own long-lost camel, either stolen or strayed, when the indelible brand proving its original owner, enables him to reclaim it. The most curious thing we heard about the camels and their masters, our interpreter vouched for as a fact, and by no means an uncommon one, that, so acute is the smell as well as the eye of a Bedoueen, they will tell, blindfolded, of any track of camels, not only how long since trodden, but even to what tribe the passing camels belonged!

Among the Bedoueens of this Desert the red camels are the commonest and the most esteemed; those of the Nejd (the desert about Baghdad) are generally black. It is of the latter that their tents and ābbahs are made, while the dyed colours are woven into their carpets and hangings, to form the stripes of their ābbahs and mash'lahs. The camel's milk is excellent when fresh and warm, but not when cold; nor is it rich enough to make butter. The flesh of a young camel is as good as beef; it looks coarser, but has no strong taste; and is considered a great delicacy by the Bedoueens.

The night was whiled away in hearing about all these things, and many a Bedoueen tale besides, while the glorious moon rode her course and then waned, and the morning dawn came. It was very cold that night, and we dismounted twice to try and warm ourselves; but in the morning, oh! how broiling hot it was. The low pass which opened into Tadmor itself seemed quite close to us at daylight; but wearily, wearily we journeyed on under the scorching sun till one o'clock; a mirage lent its beautiful deception to amuse us, and for a few moments it was difficult not to believe that we had water to pass before reaching the mountains, which had now swept round to the north-east, across our valley; they deepened into the very darkest violet, while, to the left, they faded into pale amethyst; presently the Saracenic Castle above Tadmor became visible, and we all got more and more excited and feverishly eager as the tombs cut in the rocks became more and more easily distinguished; then, as we began to ascend the pass, a few more, built like low towers, stood on the summits of the hill, like grave, silent, patient sentinels, beckoning us on to enter the City of the Dead.

Not all dead, however, for suddenly there dashed up the path towards us some seven or eight men, armed to the teeth, brandishing their long lances, shrieking and yelling and shouting, to welcome our good Sheikh Miguel: we had been discerned by scouts on the hill-tops, and they had galloped out to meet us. Thus accompanied we soon reached the finest and best of all the tombs (called by the Arabs the "Bride's Tomb," simply to betoken its great beauty, not because it is supposed by them to have been occupied by any bride), and we dismounted in order to examine it, and to rest a little in its shade while the Sheikh heard all the news of Tadmor. It was very bad news indeed for him, and a grievous disappointment for us all: the famine was so great in the land in consequence of the drought, that the Anazehs, knowing nothing of their beloved Sheikh's approach, had broken up their encampment and departed only three days before, going towards Baghdad in search of pasture for their camels. We discussed the possibility of pursuing and remaining a few days with them, but the direction of their track was all uncertain; pasture might or might not have been found in this hollow or in that; and three days' start in the pathless Desert made the overtaking them too doubtful and hazardous to attempt. So there was good-bye to all our promised plans, and our hopes of living among the Bedouens themselves, feasting on camel's meat and milk, and seeing all sorts of Bedouen mares and sports: the Sheikh's new tent, too, which he had promised for our special use, had been carried off to be "seasoned;" altogether the disappointment was very great; but to the

Sheikh himself it was much heavier,—he was longing to see his young sons, and had intended to take them back with him for the winter, to give them some education in Damascus: now all was frustrated, or at least deferred to another year.

We bemoaned his disappointment and our own for some time, and then turned to examine the Tomb. It is composed of a square tower, thirty feet on each side, and eighty feet in height, divided into four stories; the lowest story has three huge blocks of stone in the centre, lessening in size one above another, through which a flat-headed doorway is cut, with deep mouldings and much ornament; above this is an arched window, the sides of which are formed of human-headed bulls, much resembling the Assyrian type. Under this, a recumbent figure, like a swathed mummy, lies on a projecting slab, and a tablet, bearing an inscription in Palmyrene, with a Greek translation, says that it is the tomb of the Elabelos family, with a date of the Seleucidæ era, corresponding to A.D. 102; the chamber on the ground floor is, on each side, divided into four compartments, which narrow pyramidally as they ascend; a fluted Corinthian pilaster ornaments each division; these recesses have several stone shelves across them for the reception of bodies embalmed and wrapped in mummy cloth, of which large quantities lie about; at the end of the chamber opposite to the door, there are two rows of fine busts, nine in all, standing on shelves, and other busts on the walls, but the chief beauty inside is the exquisite ceiling carved in medallions, like that of the peristyle of the Temple of Jupiter at Baalbek, containing busts, birds and flowers, delicately sculptured, upon a bright blue ground; they are somewhat broken, but we thought we discerned the eagle with Ganymede in one of them; a handsome cornice surrounds the chamber. One of the eight compartments is occupied by a small staircase leading to the upper stories, which are lighted by narrow loopholes for windows; the ceiling of the second is of elaborate geometrical patterns; the third had only a pretty cornice; and the fourth was quite plain; the recesses round this upper chamber are vaulted; all the ceilings are of enormous stones laid quite across the chambers, and like the rest of the building within and without most beautifully united; the stone, too, is of the purest white. The general proportions of this building are charming, and the details are carried out with such high artistic skill, that it is a perfect gem,—sad and mysterious it looks, as it stands there alone, in the middle of the pass, against the deep blue sky.

We were soon remounted, impatient to go on,—only a few steps further to the very middle of the Wady, and then—what can be more beautiful, more glorious in all the world, than the view that burst upon our eyes! There—like nothing in Nature, but the first time one sees the wide ocean spread before one, lay the Desert in its apparently boundless infinitude, glowing in radiant colours of unnumbered variety; while, like jewels laid upon her fair bosom, stood Tadmor, though in ruins, still empress of the plain, majestically grand! First, though furthest off, the Temple of the Sun rose up in giant massiveness; then as we advanced another step, the splendid Colonnade, with the Triumphal Arch, its noble gateway,—and one building succeeded another, each and all dazzlingly white, save where touched with shining gold or rosy pink—how absolutely interminable it seemed, as column succeeded column in endless succession, up to the very mountain foot, meeting other colonnades which branched off at right angles and then faded down in ruins,—lone columns standing up here and there, and those of the Amphitheatre curving round in a broken semicircle, amidst the miles and miles of scattered stones, broken pillars, fallen pediments, and huge blocks, which covered the whole ground! a few dark masses told out from among the light columns; these were the platforms of smaller temples and halls, and one, the palace of poor Zenobia! On the left, above all this, the Saracenic castle looked down very grandly from its lordly height upon the elder ruins below, while green gardens of fruit trees and graceful palms clustered together at the extreme right of the great Temple.

On we went, our armed escort, in triumph at our safe arrival, screaming and shouting, and the horsemen, who had come out to welcome us, careering about on their wonderful horses over rock and ruin, with utter heedlessness of all obstacles, like persons possessed; and as soon as we began to cross the plain and to near the ruins, the townspeople came streaming out in a great mob, shrieking their noisy welcomes and crowding round the Sheikh as if they would pull him off the camel with their impetuous embraces, kissing his hands and knees at every half-step. We rode to the eastern side of the Temple and debated whether to encamp there in the shade, or further off among the gardens,—the crowds of people soon decided the point,—we saw we never should have had one instant's peace near the town. So we went on, the camels starting aside in horror every now and then from the dead carcase of some wretched camel left mouldering in the way, till, down a little descent, we reached a small terrace, secluded and quiet, from whence a very low, ancient stone door, still turning on its original stone hinges, admitted us into a delicious garden of olives, plums, and pomegranates: the camels were unloaded on the terrace, and we ladies retired into the thickets of the garden to enjoy the welcome luxury of a good bathe in the little river which ran through it.

In spite of our fatigues we wandered out after dinner, under the irresistible temptation of a full moon, among the ruins: we had seen Karnak and Baalbek by moonlight, and we were thankful to see Tadmor also with the Desert around it dipped in molten silver: the light and graceful Colonnade, and the heavy masses of the great Temple, are above all things lovely in the solemn holy light of the moon, and we could have stayed there all night, had we not known that we were risking a good deal. We had taken the interpreter with us as our guard and guide, and we believed all the people to be asleep, at this hour, within the gates of the town: but, as we were standing in the ruins of Zenobia's palace, suddenly voices were heard,—“E Wullah!” and “Mash'allah!” exclaimed the guide, “if these are stranger Arabs we are undone! and here they come!” He quickly motioned us to keep behind him, and advanced to meet them as two Bedoueens came tumbling over the stones, laughing loudly: they stopped short when they saw we had an Anazeh with us, and on being told we were friends of Sheikh Miguel, they made a rough salaam, and said, “Allah give you peace!” but we took the hint that there might be others about, and quickened our steps towards the encampment without any loss of time; the Sheikh had been obliged to go into the village to eat pilaf and receive welcomes without end, and was much displeased with us for having ventured so far at night without him. Probably the Bedoueens knew he was in the village, as they were townspeople themselves, and had kindly followed us to relieve us of any superfluous articles we might have in wear, but, finding one of the Sheikh's people with us, they did not dare to do so.

The Sheikh's tent having been sent away, we were under the necessity of sleeping here, as well as on the journey, under the unveiled stars; but it was no subject of regret even to my sister or myself: we had become accustomed to our hard couches upon the dry stony ground, with sketch-books and saddle-bags for pillows; here we had the graceful branches of a palm tree waving above us, and we slept well, night after night, in the warm, soft, delicious air.

PART II.—THE RUINS.

THE Temple of the Sun is, of course, the first thing to be thought of at Tadmor. It is an immense pile of gigantic masonry, enclosing a square of 740 feet each way, one fifth larger than the court of the Temple at Jerusalem, the structure to which it is best comparable; for, unlike the beautiful temples of Greece, which stood with all their charms of light and oft-repeated shafts disclosed to the first and most distant glance of every eye, those of Tadmor and Jerusalem were jealously enclosed in a double row of cloisters, with a high massive wall, the Temple itself standing isolated nearly in the centre of this cloistered court; the whole structure is, like that at Baalbek, raised up on a platform of large stones, surrounded by a broad moat, now nearly filled up, but still distinct. It would be very interesting to ascertain whether there are the same, or any substructions formed beneath this platform, as there are under those on which both Baalbek and Jerusalem stand: so similar is the idea of all the three platforms, that it is probable they exist; but, from the filling up of the ground, the entrances are very likely hidden. The surrounding wall was seventy feet high on all sides; the flat surface broken by a row of pilasters, supported on a slightly projecting base, and a few false doors and pediments unsymmetrically placed. The west side was pierced by a magnificent doorway and portico; the latter has disappeared, and been replaced by a strong Saracenic wall with a lofty door. Through breaches in the external wall, many of the columns of the cloisters may be seen, while, above all, the lofty columns of the Temple itself tower up with much beauty and elegance.

As great things stoop to mean uses, this wall now encloses the whole town of Tadmor — the miserable hovels thickly fill up every portion of the court, clustering in the corners round the columns up to their very capitals, hanging on to the carved ornaments like decayed birds' nests, and poisoning the once sacred enclosure with foetid squalor and indescribable filth. It is almost impossible to get any general idea of the ruins, even as they are, through this horrible swarm; and probably before many generations have passed these people will have succeeded in destroying every vestige of the interior of this once glorious edifice.

The Great Portal was thirty-two feet high, and sixteen wide, standing between two smaller doorways: the sides and lintel were each of a single stone, and all are exquisitely ornamented with bands of carving, in wreaths of fruit and flowers, quite as graceful and artistic as those of Baalbek, but not as deeply cut. One of the great sides of the central door has half fallen from its place, and leans like a tired giant against the Saracenic wall: all are blackened with the smoke of the fires which the Arabs, who make a dwelling-place of this portal, are constantly burning there. Above each doorway are two huge projecting brackets, which look very mysterious — possibly they once supported statues. A hundred columns — perhaps more — of the double cloisters still stand; but it is excessively difficult to see the half of them, even though one clammers on to the tops of some of the Arab houses.

Opposite the portal stood the Temple itself; the cella was surrounded by a single row of lofty columns with bronze capitals, all of which have of course disappeared, as the natives even now constantly throw down the pillars and friezes in order to wrench out the clamping irons between them. Parts of the beautifully carved entablature remain; the festoons of flowers held up by winged figures or genii are still quite visible; and when gilded by the rays of the western sun, with the bronze capitals shining in the light, it must have been a noble and striking picture, — even now it is one of the finest bits at Tadmor, when the sun sinks low enough to illumine the lofty columns only, and the western wall throws the miserable wretchedness at their feet into shade. Several fragments are left, both here and in two small Temples at some distance, in which a row of short columns are mounted upon others of ordinary size, forming, in fact, a clerestory, like that in the Hypostyle Hall at Karnak, and, as is shown by Mr. Ferguson, like the House of the Forest of Lebanon (1 Kings vii.) at Jerusalem, and the Hall of Xerxes at Persepolis.

The Sheikh took us into the Mosque, which was once the Temple sanctuary — a large hall, with a single row of Corinthian columns on each side; but one cannot be sure whether these stand in their original positions or not, they are so strange a patchwork of various remains — capitals, turned upside down, now acting as the bases of some of them. At the north end is a large arch with much sculpture, which has probably been added by the Arabs; and at each side are two small chambers with richly-carved ceilings, one of which has the signs of the zodiac, with figures of the deities still visible, despite the efforts of the Mooslims to destroy them. On the soffit of the arch is the eagle with expanded wings, resembling the famous eagle at Baalbek. A small staircase leads to the roof of this Mosque, whence the view is as grand as it is extraordinary: such a strange mixture of crowded wretchedness in the living present, contrasting with the faded witnesses of the splendour of the past — the sadness of the broken friezes and prostrate columns, and the nobility of those that still soar up against the cloudless sky with their richly-carved capitals, and the graceful rows of colonnades in the plain outside, leading the eye into the boundless Desert beyond, dying away on the horizon in its garb of many colours. It is curious that an earthquake has so shaken the external wall of the Temple that two sides — the north and the south — lean very considerably inwards, without the stones being relatively displaced: it is now as if they had been so built intentionally to give them an Egyptian or pyramidal air.

At about 300 yards' distance from the north-west angle of the Temple, is the grand Triumphal Arch commencing the chief Colonnade: a very curious and remarkably beautiful piece of building it is. The central arch is flanked by a lower one on each side; but between them, on either side, are inserted two oblique arches, projecting southwards, but so as to be

3/15
62

TRIUMPHAL ARCH - TADMOR.

E. A. Beaufort, del.

PLATE 100.

invisible in a front view: taken with the central arch alone they are gracefully pretty, but then the side arches cannot be seen at the same time. Flanking the gateway, on the south, are three columns on each side, very curious ones, — round and square columns united together, the square sides facing each other, and the same with the round, — with double capitals placed one above the other: these capitals are in bad taste, but all else about the triumphal arch is beautiful. The sculpture on the inner (north) side is rich and uninjured — endless varieties of wreaths and scrolls, and bands of fruit and flowers, and fantastic ornaments gracefully mingled, cut with equal skill to those at Baalbek, and in better taste, because not so loaded, — heads are carved on the great door jambs, and beautiful bits of sculpture lie in half-buried heaps all around. From this Arch four rows of columns, forming a triple Colonnade, ran towards the mountains for very nearly a mile in length! — not quite straight, for it bends slightly to the north-east, enough to prevent a vista to the very end. The columns are fifty-seven feet high, formed of three drums, of which nearly all the lower ones are now covered up with loose sand, while between the second and third a narrow stone is inserted, from which a bracket projects, probably intended to support a bust, as they are too near the top for statues: doubtless this must have had a fine effect when the busts stood there; but at present they have a very singular and awkward appearance; several of them still bear inscriptions in Palmyrene, and also in Greek, giving the names of the persons whose portraits they bore. The capitals are of richly sculptured acanthus leaves, rather stiffly arranged; and on the abacus is an ornament very common at Tadmor — a row of oval balls with roses sculptured between each ; the columns are united by a plain architrave, supporting a very rich entablature of the pine-cone pattern, extending the whole way ; above that came a frieze of billet moulding, with a row of the egg-and-rose moulding finishing the whole ; only very few stones of this frieze yet remain in situ. A double gateway, one beyond the other, on the west side, ornamented with a broad band of the pine-cone pattern bent round the arch, and a well-executed moulding of the egg-and-rose ornament, leads to a row of columns placed in a semicircle, which is supposed to have been the amphitheatre : nine of these columns are still upright, and many others broken off ; they have all brackets on each side, looking, in their present meaningless position, like the handles on a paviour's pound ; a rich frieze still unites some of the columns, and finely sculptured pediments and other stones are heaped up in huge masses on the ground. There is another gateway similar to this further on, and opposite to it a Colonnade branched off to the east, or a small Temple may have stood here, for there are one or two tall slender columns, and some others supporting a second story of little columns. Not far from the great Triumphal Arch at the entrance, are four monolithic shafts, only one of which is standing upright now,—they are of dark red granite, with capitals and bases of the ordinary stone : this granite is said to be Egyptian, and to have been brought here by Solomon at the foundation of Tadmor,—the tradition may be false, but it is not a bit more extraordinary than half the facts appertaining to Tadmor and Baalbek.

Between these two gateways, a little to the west, are enormous heaps of masonry—one heap is said to have been a Hall of Justice ; the other, to which a street of columns appears to have led, has time out of mind been declared the ruins of Zenobia's Palace. It has all the appearance of a palace; and the tradition seems confirmed by the very remarkable quantity of broken ornaments with which the loose sand is filled,—if a stone is displaced hundreds of fresh pieces of glass, sometimes prettily shaped and of every colour of the rainbow, are turned up, with beads of all shapes. Many metal ornaments also, evidently for females, have been found here, and are now worn by the Bedoueen women.

Towards the end of the Colonnade are four large square masses of masonry some twelve or fourteen feet high; and here probably was the central intersection of the city among the royal and public buildings; it is believed that these square masses were the pedestals on which statues or groups of statues once stood, or the bases of a four-sided triumphal arch like that at Latakia and many other places; these pedestals are found still existing at Shuhba in the Hauran, a city of unknown date,—in the centre of the ruins of Jerash,—in the middle of ancient Antioch,—and, I believe, at Bozrah.

About a quarter of a mile to the east of this there stands a little gem of a Temple, almost perfect in form, though the sculpture is sadly mutilated; it is called, by tradition, the Temple of the King's Mother. It is very small, simply a cella with pilasters against the outer wall, and a portico of six beautiful columns and two half-columns, which (if my memory does not fail me) were fluted. The whole building is mounted on a small platform; the stones are, as usual at Tadmor, very finely joined, and the capitals are richly and well carved, preserving their freshness and sharp cutting still; the view from it is perhaps the best of Tadmor as a whole,—it is superb. The little Temple faces that of the Sun, the eye then sweeps up the whole length of the Colonnade, with the distant gardens seen between the columns, then the dark masses of Zenobia's Palace, and interminable columns beyond, up to the fine mountains dividing the Baghdad desert from the Wady Kebeer, by which we had come. (See Frontispiece.) One afternoon that we walked out here is worth a few words of description: the day had been changeable and stormy, but the sunset came with its usual magnificent glow, and the stones of the little Temple seemed literally overspread with burnished gold, contrasting with the crimson and pink splendour of the western sky. Suddenly, and while the sun was still bright and warm, the great silver globe of the refulgent moon sprang up from the distant horizon, throwing an instantaneous flood of blue-white light over the immense plain, meeting the sun-glow in which we still stood; and scarcely had we time to observe the peculiar harmony melting into one another, when, with the rapidity of change belonging to an eastern sky, in the Desert especially, a densely black storm-cloud burst suddenly forth from behind the mountain close beside us, and pouring down over our heads came the dark, heavy shower, actually falling between the calm and lovely moonlight and the rich glory of the setting sun! It was, perhaps, just one of those moments in Nature which one might live a hundred years without ever seeing a second time; but it was something, once seen, never to be forgotten.

There is no spot like this small Temple for obtaining a general idea of the immense proportions and mass of the Temple of the Sun, with the huge platform on which it stands; but it struck me still more here than even at Thebes and Baalbek how little these magnificent Temples were built for external beauty. Exquisite and splendid as they were, the coup d'œil was always after entering the doorway, since, in every case, the Temples were shut in by a wall, above which only the most lofty of the columns towered: with the Greeks it was exactly the contrary—the splendour of their temples was chiefly on the exterior; and we moderns strive more for external rather than internal effect. One would have thought that the Temple of the Sun above all would have been more open than any others; but perhaps the ancients knew best,—like the surpassing splendour and the golden lining to the House of the Lord in Solomon's Temple, the rays of the sun were collected in the Temples of Baal, between the shadows of the surrounding walls, and thus concentrated the attention of the worshipper on the immediate shrine of the Deity. At Baalbek it is doubtful whether the walls on the west and north sides were ever built, or intended to be built, much higher than the bases of the columns; but I could not help fancying, as I thought over the other examples, that it had been as lofty as the rest, or as it is now. With the idea of concentration, these walls would be less required at Baalbek than anywhere else, for there the view is hemmed in by the lofty mountains that bend round three sides of the Temple; whereas at Tadmor, Karnak, or Thebes, one can imagine the sort of want—almost a necessity—for the mind to feel some arrest or refuge from the boundless infinitude all round, before it anchored on the shrine of the holy Symbol within.

Between the giant and the little fairy-like Temple there is a spring of good water, and a deep hollow which, for half the year, is a little lake: it has been well lined with masonry, and the stream murmurs over the pavement with a pleasant little sound. An aqueduct also crosses the plain here, which once carried water from the mountain to the Great Temple. Nearer, indeed quite close to the Colonnade on this side, are the remains of the women's Baths; they are much ruined, and covered over with sand; but two or three openings are still kept free with narrow stone steps, where the townswomen come all day to fill their pitchers; the water is of a high temperature.

Beyond the extremity of the Colonnade, among heaps of ruins of all manner of beautiful things, there are several Temples (possibly mausoleums or baths, but they seem more like the remains of temples): one has a pediment elaborately sculptured; a portico of another seems to have stretched across the end of the Colonnade, some portion of which is still standing,—and a sarcophagus, inside a small Temple near this, sculptured on the sides with garlands of fruit and flowers held up by satyrs, is worth looking at. It is perfectly impossible to describe the details of the immense amount of ruin closely heaped together in this part—friezes and capitals and nameless fragments richly and beautifully sculptured with vine and acanthus leaves, fruits and flowers, wreaths and medallions in endless variety, among scrolls of geometrical network and fantastic ornaments—all cut in that richly-coloured stone, which is in itself a beautiful thing: as you hold it in your hand, or step over it, it is couleur de rose tendre, blushing at itself,—as the sun shines on the vertical mass, it is dyed over with gold, rich, luscious, and gleaming;—while, at a few miles' distance, it is of a dazzling white; the buildings of Tadmor would be beautiful and grand in anything and anywhere; but they owe much to their material;—in the stern, grim granite of our cold North, and in this vast and lonely position, they would be very solemn and very mournful—a very spectacle of grief: but in this lovely stone, endowed with such rich and tender hues, the otherwise human-made thing seems spiritualised into a solid fancy—a dreamlike fabric of some delicate thought, congealed by a magician's hand into tangible stone. Sydney Yendys has a fine simile of the Coliseum, resembling an old gladiator slowly dying, crumbling away in mouldering grief—a true picture of the ruins of the West, where Time flings funereal garlands of autumn-fallen leaves over her dead:—Palmyra seemed to me, from the first instant I saw it stretched out before me in all its investiture of bright colours, like a fair maiden, a flower-crowned bride, lying down in a repose that was really Death, though it seemed only a deep sleep, with her white robes and her fair flowers still around her, they living though she was dead, floating down the stream of time—"the queenliest dead that ever died so young!" Yes, and even though "The Crown is withered, yet the Queendom lasts!"

There are countless more ruins of temples, and colonnades, and monumental columns, extending on all sides—but I spare the reader any more; besides, that I myself never got so far as to see the half of them.

Tadmor has been a good deal run down by those who have not seen it,—the difficulties of getting there are so great, that it was best to find out the grapes to be fed on when there were sour; then it was thought a good way of exalting Baalbek, to declare that even the city of Adrianopolis was not to be compared to that of Heliopolis: whereas, the fact is, that Tadmor is not comparable with any single group of temples such as Baalbek: there is scarcely another city in the world standing, with its streets and public buildings still distinctly marked out, without a modern city overlying the ancient one: it is not only a few temples, but a whole city, once vast and complete; and thus Nineveh, Persepolis, and Thebes are, perhaps, its only prototypes. I was once asked whether Palmyra was "not a broken-down old thing in a style of slovenly decadence?" Of course, its style is neither pure nor severe—nothing over which the lavish hand of hasty and Imperial Rome has passed is ever so: but Tadmor is free from all the vulgarity of real decadence; it is so entirely irregular as to be sometimes fantastic; the designs are overflowing with richness and fancy, but it is never heavy—it is free, independent, bizarre, but never ungraceful—grand, indeed, though hardly sublime, it is almost always bewitchingly beautiful.

The union of the square-and-round column in one—one of the characteristics of Syrian architecture—is commonly repeated; the chief ornaments employed are the egg-and-rose moulding and the pine-cone, as I believe it is called usually: here, in the Colonnade frieze, this ornament is like a succession of pine-apples; but it is very difficult to see it distinctly, as, though much has fallen within reach of examination, it is also much worn. The pattern might be a representation of fish scales, when it would be in connection with the worship of Derceto, the mother of Ninus—one of the names of the sun in Phœnicia, where a fish was an emblem commonly adopted for Baal; or perhaps it is a pattern formed of the cone, under which form the Syrians adored the sun, and also Jupiter; as the Paphians adored Venus, mysteriously representing her in a pyramidal or flame-shaped stone. That the pine-cone was a religious emblem throughout India and Assyria is well known; it was sacred to Bacchus for the intoxicating quality of its resin, with which the old Romans medicated their wines—the fiercely-burning, fiery characteristic of its balsam or resin was, it is supposed, used as a type of the life-giving properties of the sun. Of the Phœnicians one cannot help thinking in looking at Tadmor,—that platform chants the same mysterious strain as the platform of Baalbek; and whether these “great stones, and costly stones, and hewed stones,” date only from the mighty hands of King Solomon, or that they had stood there for ages before, when there were giants in the land, they must have had the same origin as those at Baalbek. The Phœnicians, or Canaanites, as they are usually called in Scripture, planted cities in the Haurân and the Lejah—may they not also have had a city here, by the abundant Desert spring, of which Solomon took advantage when he built his store-cities, “Baalath and Tadmor, in the wilderness”? It was, in fact, the bulwark or outpost of the kingdom of Israel, which extended to the banks of the Euphrates (Gen. xv. 18; Exod. xxiii. 31; 1 Kings iv. 21, 24), and had been built for the protection of his caravans bringing merchandise from India and Assyria.

At the foot of the range of hills we had crossed in arriving at Tadmor, and at the distance of a good mile from the furthest end of the Grand Colonnade, there is a hollow in which a little chasm opens, ending with a cave which is said to go some way underground, but which we could not explore, as we had brought no candles from Damascus. From this cave a stream comes bubbling quietly out—this is the Râs el 'Ain (the head of the fountain)—and from this the little river flows for about three miles before it is lost in the thirsty sand. Nothing can be more limpid than this stream as it runs away over the little stones; it has no other beauty save the clusters of brilliant sulphur which cover the rocks of the chasm, for the water of the spring is saturated with sulphur, and is of a very high temperature; it had cooled, and the taste of sulphur decreased, in the two miles of its windings, before it reached the spot where we encamped. Gardens and fruit trees cluster round its banks, and shade the waters, and certainly the sulphur does not lessen the luxuriance of the trees: we used to fill a large leathern bag, called a zemzimeer, every morning, and hang it in the branches of one of the trees—in a couple of hours the sulphur had precipitated itself, and the water was perfectly cold and sweet. But before we left Tadmor, we thought that the daily bathing in the hot stream, and the having no other water to drink, had made us all feel weak and languid. There were other causes for this feeling, however; the year had been one of excessive drought and consequent famine—the Desert pastures had all failed, and there was but little food of any kind for the camels, of whom vast numbers had died, and the town was thickly strewn and surrounded with rotting carcasses; for where they dropped down, the carcasses were left—the Tadmorites have an idea that the smell is wholesome, and when they are sick, they go and sit beside one of the putrid carcasses to inhale the beneficial perfume! Inside the town, every one possessing a camel keeps it, like the Irish pig, with the family in their tent or hovel, or it lives outside the door, in the lane. If the poor beast dies, there it stays, as if nothing had happened; and unhappily, because one year lately some dogs went mad, the people shot them all, so that now there are only vultures to do the scavenger's work, so fearfully necessary everywhere, but especially under the powerful Eastern sun. There were scores of carcases within the gates; and as we were walking along the narrow lanes, especially once when darkness overtook us, it was impossible to avoid stumbling over and crunching into the disgusting heaps, and stepping not only over, but through them! It was only among the ruins that we ever escaped the smell; and in spite of the opinion of the Tadmor people, and of some French medical philosophers, I am convinced that we all suffered seriously from the horrible stench—the whole place was unhealthy. Several of our Argeels got fever, and lay groaning and shivering by day and by night; the Arab remedy for which disease—on the homœopathic principle of “like curing like”—was to place the unhappy patient, without any covering but his ordinary clothes, to lie in the full blaze of the mid-day sun! I need scarcely say that we did not observe any beneficial results from this treatment.

The people of Tadmor are most unmitigated barbarians; they are Fellaheen of the lowest order, permitted by the Bedouens to live within the town, on condition of their acting as purveyors for the tribes; the caravans from Aleppo and Damascus to Baghdad all touch there, and leave the kefiyehs and mash’lahs, &c., which the Bedouen requires; then they tend the groves and gardens along the stream, one half of the fruit of which the Bedouens buy, and the other half they take. They are a rough, rude set, and have all the vices of the Bedouen, without any of his virtues. It was a perfect ordeal to go even for a few moments inside the gates—men, women, and children would instantly pour forth from their hovels and mob us, examining our clothes, pulling us about, trying to feel whether our arms and legs were made of flesh and blood, like those of the Arabs, or of some Western substance quite differently fashioned; while they roared, screamed, and shouted in our ears enough to deafen us. One day that we wanted to climb up on one of the houses to see the view, the Sheikh of Tadmor himself accompanied us, and two of our Argeels, in hopes of keeping the peace—but it was entirely useless; the scrambling process was difficult enough of itself, and with the whole population swarming round us to see the show, not even the whip of the Sheikh, nor the sticks of the Argeels, had the slightest effect in clearing the way; several times they took us by the shoulders, and turned us round to see our faces; and more than once I received a heavy thump on my head—for the purpose, I believe, of ascertaining that I had a natural head under my large brown hat, which was in itself a source of high astonishment to the savages. So it is not to be wondered at that we only thrice endeavoured to see the inside of the town; nor that we turned deaf ears to the numerous enticing invitations from the Sheikh to dinner, as well as to the more serious offers made to my sister and myself. The morning after our arrival, in our first walk out to the ruins, a crowd of townspeople mobbed us in the Great Arch; and several men eagerly begged to know how much our relations would expect for us. In spite of the assurance that Frank women were never thus sold, they continued to bid for us; and after my shaking my head at some of their offers, one man enthusiastically rose to the sum of 10,000 piasters; but, like the fox in the fable, when told decidedly that he could not have me at any price, he turned away and said, "I would have offered another thousand if her eyes had been black!"

The Sheikh of Tadmor himself held out tempting promises. He had already four wives, who occupied, he explained, one large room in his house, each one with her family inhabiting a corner; but he was tired of one of them, and would willingly get rid of her; and he impressed upon us, with a bewitching air on his coarse, ill-favoured countenance, that he did so much wish for an Ingleez wife! he rose to the astonishing price of nine camels, and added a tenth when he heard I was a good rifle shot! He was a horrid savage, this Sheikh Faras, cruel and mean, a very different character from his brother, Sheikh 'Ali, who was set aside from the Sheikhship on account of his being lame and deformed, but who was the friend and adviser, the judge and consoler of all the townspeople: he could read and write, and had a good deal of intelligence and quiet good sense. A dreadful story was whispered to us of something Sheikh Faras had done a year or two before, when the Anazehs were encamped round the town, but both the Sheikhs were away in war: Faras stole about a score of camels from the tribe, and was manufacturing a story of how he had got them, prior to bringing them home, when Sheikh Miguel unexpectedly returned to Tadmor: and he could not find an excuse for going out through the camp to the place where he had concealed them. The war was suddenly concluded, and the Anazehs did not move; four months after the miserable animals were found by accident, tethered in a small deep hollow as the wretch had left them. The poor creatures had gnawed each other as they stood tied together, and the skeletons, picked by the vultures, yet remained leaning against each other, whitening in the sun!

There never had been known such a year of distress as the present one in this Desert. To the south of Tadmor, at this season, it is generally green with herbs, affording pasture to the camels: now it was all parched and burned up; and though towards the east some of the ground appeared green and smiling at a distance, the herb was not high enough to be browsed on by any animal. Scarcely any rain had fallen in the preceding winter; the torrent-beds remained dry, and the ground unsoftened: now even the wells and springs were dry also. Another such year, they said, would be absolute destruction to the tribes, and their hearts were very sad and heavy; for the time of the early rains had come, but none had as yet fallen. The Anazehs, as I have said, had gone eastwards, in hopes of finding pasture; but the camels were so weak and so few, from the frightful mortality among them, that great numbers of their women had been left in the town of Tadmor to get on as well as they could till the next spring; those women and children who had gone with the tribe had most of them walked, leaving their "carriages" behind them. These carriages, or howdahs, are wooden frameworks, covered with scarlet cloth, and gaily ornamented with ostrich feathers and shells, placed over the back of the camel for the women and children to be carried in; but this year the camels' humps were so reduced that the howdahs could not be fastened on, and the weak legs had to be spared all unnecessary burden. All this distress falls most heavily on the Sheikh; for should one of the Bedoueens lose his camels—their only wealth—the Sheikh must set the example of giving him one of his own, and those who have most, contribute in order after him, until the poor man has again as much as he had lost. The Sheikh is essentially the father of his people; and in years of distress, when he has many losses among his own camels, and has to share what he has with those who are poor, he is sometimes reduced really to poverty. In time of war the Sheikh takes, by right, a large proportion of the spoil: at other times what a man gains by his own prowess he is entitled to keep, though he generally makes an offering of some part of it to the Sheikh. One evening, just at dark, when we were seated round our dinner, a heavy cloud broke into rain: we hastily concluded the soon-diluted soup, and retreated under our carpets; but the Sheikh ran joyfully up the bank, and stood there with a light heart, watching the clouds, and listening to the thunder as sweet music, praising Allah for His goodness, and calling out to assure us that we should have a thorough wet night! We were as glad as possible, under the circumstances—all the more as we had fortunately that day purchased a nice, thick Tadmor carpet, which, however, did not prevent the rain from soaking down in little lakes underneath us. But the next morning all was dry; it had rained but an hour or two, and the Sheikh was as sad as ever: “Mashallah! it is God’s will,” was all he said, with the submission and acquiescence, not fatalism only, of a really good Mooslim, “and He knows best!” The very next day we heard a dreadful story. Some Arabs came in from a journey they had been making, and told the Sheikh that not very far from Tadmor, only three or four days’ journey, they had come to an encampment of black Bedouen tents. They rode on and on, and were surprised at hearing no barking of dogs—still more at seeing no smoke from the cooking fires. Puzzled, and wondering what it could mean, they reached the tents—still the same silence, and not a moving thing to be seen. At last they dismounted, stuck their lances in the ground, and entered one of the tents, with the customary “Peace be to all here:” it was peace indeed; for, lying on the ground, were stretched the corpses of women and children in every tent of the encampment! It was an encampment of the dead! Their husbands and fathers had left them, to seek food and water; but they never returned, and were afterwards found at various distances, strewn about, as they had dropped by the way, lying dead beside their dead camels!

We heard while at Tadmor (for he never told us any stories about himself), two anecdotes, among many others, of Sheikh Miguel, characteristic of the courage and daring for which he is so justly noted,—the real, cool courage, free from all Arab boast or bluster. Some hostile Arabs of another tribe came down one night last winter, and stole all the cattle of the Tadmor townspeople: Sheikh Miguel was staying there at the time, en passant, just as he was now staying there for us; but of course the affair was no concern of his; nor do the Bedouens like interfering with each other's quarrels. So he sat in his tent smoking, not thinking to be mixed up in it, when Sheikh Faras and some of the Tadmorites came and petitioned for his help. He could not resist the appeal of distress, for he is a generous and most kind-hearted man, and in a few moments he rose up and mounted his mare. Then turning round quietly to the Sheikh of Tadmor and his companions—great blusterers and little doers—he said, “You can keep in the valley; I will go up yonder mountain and bring back the cattle.” He galloped off, and before long caught sight of the cattle, collected together, and guarded by seven or eight men. Though perfectly alone, he rode straight up to them, and demanded in a loud voice, “How dare you take cattle when I am here?” and fired off his revolver among them. In a moment the whole set of men ran off, and the Sheikh quietly drove back all the cattle himself to the town!

Another time he happened to be quite alone with several camels and a large flock of goats, when a Ghuzoo appeared in sight at a distance: away flew the Sheikh on his swift steed directly towards them, beckoning with his hand as if encouraging those behind him to follow, and singing his own war-songs very loud. They recognised him on hearing them, and the whole body turned about, took to their heels, and fled away!

We had not as much of Sheikh Miguel's society during our stay at Tadmor as we should have liked; by sunrise we were all out in different directions — sight-seeing, curiosity-hunting, and sketching; and though we took refuge in our pretty shady garden during the mid-day heat, he was then always settling business in the town, or surrounded by visitors and friends who came down to our encampment. The Bedoueens have little curiosity, thinking few people worth as much consideration as themselves; but the townspeople were glad enough of the excuse to come down and stare at the Frank ladies, asking endless questions about everything, and, if they could get an opportunity, feeling our dresses, inquiring how much they were worth, &c. &c.; they also particularly enjoyed seeing us eat, just as we visit the Zoological Gardens at home at feeding time. We fed indeed on much the same food as themselves, — Arab bread, which is always good when fresh, and, morning and evening, a fowl stewed in a basin of dhourra, called bourghoul, with sometimes a few dates; but the grand curiosity was seeing us all eat together, — for, with the Arabs, the men and women always feed separately, — besides the astonishing knives and forks that we used. They brought down quantities of curiosities to sell us; unfortunately they have begun to learn their real value, and where they used to ask a piaster they now demand a mejidi, and as often price bits of natural stone or pebbles quite as high as the real antiques. Sometimes these trifles are of as much value to them as the best antiques; for instance, a black stone marked with a cross in any way, is called a "luck-stone," and insures to the fortunate owner the fidelity and warm affection of her husband or lover as long as she possesses the stone. Anything bright or pretty they string together in long necklaces, with coins, &c., and sometimes they, unconsciously, possess very beautiful and valuable things among the veriest rubbish. Several women had some beautifully engraved gems and cameos, with which, however, they would not part at any reasonable price; some ancient gold coins, and many small square pieces of stone, or some composition, with figures impressed upon them, which are supposed to have been Palmyrene weights, and have been picked up in great numbers in the ruins where the private houses of the city stood; they have also numbers of coral and agate beads, and sometimes some good uncut jewels, picked up generally near Baghdad. We were always looking out among the women's necklaces for the small Assyrian cylinders, some of the best of which have been so discovered; and one day the Sheikh took us into the town to the house of one of the richest women to see a cylinder she had, and which he thought she might be induced to sell to us. We made our way into a large windowless room, full of smoke, in which the mistress was weaving one of the excellent carpets the Tadmor people make, of brightly dyed camels' hair, thick and close, striped with pretty patterns. Of course we were soon in the midst of a crowd, with all the women trying as usual to kiss us — a hobby of theirs, that cost us a great deal of trouble in dodging round each other and making ingenious escapes. At last she brought the necklace with the cylinder of pale pink carnelian, cut with several Assyrian devices, one of them a priest in the act of making offerings on an altar before the sun. Seeing how much we were interested in it, she asked un prix fou, and we went off to pay a promised visit to Sheikh 'Ali, the Moollah of the mosque, who gave us coffee in a clean nice room—the only clean one we saw in Tadmor—and insisted on our dining some day with him, enumerating on his fingers the various dishes he would provide for our entertainment. He was an intelligent old man, and seemed respected, for he was able to keep the crowd from tormenting us; and after some days he induced the woman to give us the cylinder at a reasonable price.

We had the good fortune to issue from the great gate of the town just as Sheikh Faras was coming in mounted on his finest mare, a grey of beautiful and splendid form. She was considered priceless, and he would not have sold her for any sum; but Sheikh Miguel said if any misfortune obliged him to part with her, he would probably value her at 1800*l*. Very beautiful she was; and it was as great a surprise as pleasure when, in a fit of intense and very unusual politeness, he offered one of the gentlemen of our party to mount her. There was no bridle of any kind, but he vaulted on her back, and the fleet creature was off like an arrow, and out of sight in a moment, over the heaps of loose stones and ruins without a check or stumble, while the Sheikh stood in the most amusing anxiety watching for his return and saying, "Where is he gone? how far will he go?" as if he thought her rider would run away with the beautiful creature in the wide Desert: I believe he would gladly have done so, so delightful was her pace and her extraordinary fleetness. When he came back, the Sheikh actually offered my sister and me to ride also—a high honour, which we declined very unwillingly, not being accustomed to a Turkish saddle; but we were much penetrated with the compliment, as, among themselves, it is the greatest indignity for a mare to be mounted by a woman.

The Sheikh's pretty little son, a child of about eight years old, was riding home another spirited, gentle mare, with beautiful legs and a fine small head, and some of his followers were careering about, brandishing their long lances, while we lingered at the gate of the great Temple till the sun had sunk and left us in the dark; but this grand double gateway—one, of the now old Saracenic work, and the other, the still older structure of Imperial Rome—always interested us so much that we were apt to delay beneath its shadow. It was such a curious feeling to stand here in the very narrow space between the two lofty walls, looking through the inner one to the Temple columns towering up within, lighted up with the dying sun, and to think back over the magnificent processions of worshippers that had so often gone up here to the Temple of Baal—venerable priests and eager devotees, and the kings who reigned here sovereigns of the Desert; and, in the centre of all, Zenobia, the proud empress, coming from her palace all down that pillar-shaded Colonnade, in her jewels and her beauty, entering at this very portal to bend her knee before Apollo's shrine;—while all the time our eyes watched the stream of modern life continually passing through—modern and savage, yet probably but little changed in appearance from that of the ancient inhabitants of this Desert, carrying one's mind back, far beyond the proud Roman, to Scriptural pictures of camels and sheep and goats, and the Arabs, in their simple and probably unaltered dress, like the fierce, robber-looking son of Ishmael, plentifully armed, as though "his hand was against every man,"—and we, the children of the far West and of to-day, standing there in the shadow of the Roman and the Arab, among the desolation of all the Past, and the degradation of the Present, gathering up all in one shadowy Thought,—the only eternal thing in the whole scene.

And so, thinking over the long past, we will go and visit the Tombs of Tadmor—very interesting indeed they are. There are two sets of them: some, far away on the sides of the mountain, are, like the "Bride's Tomb" before mentioned, built in the form of towers; the others are almost entirely underground excavations, with a few towers scattered among them, now so much ruined as to be little worth examination: these underground tombs are supposed to be those of the people—the towers, those of the nobles. They are all built in successive stories, usually four in number, sometimes more; the form invariably pyramidal, though in some cases with interrupting stories, of perpendicular sides. Inside, in each story, a narrow passage or chamber runs across from end to end, with three or four compartments or cells on each side, each cell containing stone shelves for the bodies, which seem to have been run in on grooves when required, as the shelves were wanting in many instances. A pyramidal-shaped opening led into a cell at the end of each chamber, originally closed by a stone door; and in some of the larger tombs this opened into other chambers. The compartments were separated by pilasters, and in one instance by fluted columns with very peculiar acanthus-leaved capitals. Staircases, usually still perfect, led from one story to another; and, strangely enough, in some instances, on the second story, where the end cell was wanting, there was a doorway, high above the ground like those in the Round Towers of Ireland ; the stone hinges for the door, and the hollow for the bolt, yet remained.

The ceilings of most of the chambers were richly ornamented with graceful patterns geometrically arranged, and many of them are still very perfect. In one Tomb the ceiling was divided into diamond-shaped compartments, those in the centre contained sculptures of winged genii, and the others held busts in high relief. Very rich cornices surround each chamber, and are frequently employed on the outside of the tomb also. In one there was a handsome variety of the egg-and-rose ornament, with a battlemented moulding above and below ; all were delicately but vigorously executed. Each cell has its own loophole for ventilation.

In the inside of one chamber, over the doorway, we saw the sculptured representation of a mummy placed on a sofa with carved legs ; the foldings of the cloth, with which the mummy was swathed, very distinctly shown, and the body garlanded with an embroidered band or wreath of flowers. The exterior of another Tomb was distinguished on the second story by a pediment, and on the third or fourth story a tablet for an inscription, guarded or supported on either side by the head of an aged man with a long beard—beautiful heads and finely executed ; like old Greek busts of grand, calm, restful, mighty faces—with closed eyes, which one fancied seemed yet silently conscious of the unnumbered ages that have passed over them, and have left there an expression of grief, but also of noble, perfect rest—mingled into glorious harmony “of more than human beauty,” said one of our party. Above these, again, were two kneeling figures, much destroyed, whether of men or women we could not tell ; on a still higher story two small heads, with wings folded back, perfect and well sculptured; and on the highest story of all, a row of small pillars and a cornice.

Outside the second story of another Tower was an arched recess, with a fine band of vine-leaves and grapes moulded round it. Within the recess lay the figure of a mummy, reposing on a carved sofa; and above that another figure, in a half-reclining posture, with three other figures standing behind it, all in good relief,—the heads had been knocked off every one. A Palmyrene inscription is here carved under the couch; these inscriptions, containing the names of the dead and a date, are usually placed outside the Tombs, and are very frequently both in Palmyrene and in Greek. All that have been found are prior to the date of Aurelian's conquest, and many of them date about the commencement of our era. The Tombs are mostly lined with white stucco, on which a good deal of colouring remains.

The score of tower Tombs, scattered among the underground Tombs in the other cemetery, near the Râs el 'Ain, are believed to be of older date than these; but they are so much ruined, and so much encumbered with sand, that they are scarcely comprehensible—many of them have been patched with more modern constructions. In one of them we discovered two headless statues, life-size, represented on one stone—husband and wife, as it were, sitting together—the male leaning back in a carved arm-chair; the female in a more reclining position, as if on a sofa, her left hand on the shoulder of her husband, and holding in her right a pine-cone like those so common in the Nineveh marbles; both are attired in graceful many-folded drapery, with rich bands of embroidery and jewels down the fronts and round the shoulders and necks of the dresses; the drapery is gathered lower down into embroidered boots.

The arrangement of the excavated Tombs is simply that of a passage or passages, with a tunnel vault overhead, usually four cells on each side, and three at the end of the passage. The whole of this hill may be honeycombed with these Tombs, concealed in the long accumulation of sand; those that are known have been discovered by such accidents as that of a camel falling into a hole, which proved to be the hollow before the entrance, or gazelles escaping into the Tomb from the chase of the hunter; many of the Tower Tombs are full of gazelles' bones and horns strewn on the ground. In all the Tombs we saw heaps of human bones, but tossed together—thrown away after the mummy-cloth had been unrolled from the bodies; for the Bedouens set great store by this gummy cloth, with the old spices still adhering to it, to use as plaisters for their sick horses. We saw no bodies yet lying there, but the Sheikh told us he had seen many; and there is no question but that in numbers of the upper stories, now inaccessible from broken staircases, or in the Tombs below the present surface of the ground, vast numbers of mummies must still lie untouched. The Sheikh mentioned having seen some in perfect condition with bronze lamps on their bosoms; and many gold ornaments have been found in them, some of which are now worn by the Bedouen and Tadmor women; we remarked, indeed, how much more elegant and tasteful some of their ornaments were than the usual run of Arab women's things.

These Tombs are all far away from the ruins and the town, and stand on the sides of a sand-blown valley. The dead calm, the lonely silence, and the utter desolation of the place are very striking, — and to the most thoughtless, sitting there among the dead, and looking out over that grand and lovely view, a thousand painfully interesting thoughts and questions cannot but be suggested. The illimitable Desert spread out beyond the mass of once luxurious Palaces, crowded Temples, and busy streets, with these Tombs full of fleshless bones, that seemed no further removed from life than the now empty, ruined buildings, alike wrapped in the same mantle of deathly silence — the warrior, the ruler, the merchant, the prince, and the people — all now swept away, with only the shadow of the shadow, as it were, of their earthly glory yet remaining! Where are their immortal souls now stored, waiting the great Day of Account? And what has He, the All-merciful, in store for those who knew not His revelation, nor His gracious Promise, nor even of His imposed Laws? What shall be the portion reserved for guiltless ignorance? The answer of unwavering trust, even in such unfathomable mystery, came in the wide-stretching Desert all around us, boundless as His Mercy; in the unmeasured sky above, trackless and incomprehensible as the mystery of Eternity; and in the all-glorious colouring in which that scene was clothed, by the Hand of Love that showers Mercy and Blessing alike upon the evil and the good; and who will one day “bring the nations” into the city which will need nor sun nor moon, for the “glory of God” will lighten it.

To make up for our terrible disappointment in not seeing the Anazehs, the Sheikh good-naturedly told us a variety of customs common among them, and one evening we got him to describe their favourite "sabre dance." The men stand close together in a half circle, elbow touching elbow, jerking themselves quickly to and fro in concert with a sideway movement, while a woman, generally the wife of the Sheikh, stands alone in the middle, swinging a sabre rapidly round and round in her hand. From time to time one or another of the men darts forward, and pretends to seize the hem of her dress. If the woman is awkward, or the man not excessively agile, a hand or a finger is cut off, or a wound of some kind given; and these accidents frequently occur,—in spite of which they are very fond of the dance: it requires, of course, great nerve and skill on the part of the woman; but the women of the tribe are not wanting in these virtues. In time of war a curious custom prevails among them. The most beautiful woman of the tribe, or rather she who combines with this most sense and courage, and has therefore most influence among them, is placed on a camel which is adorned with colours, scarlet cloth, shells, feathers, &c. The camel is then led out among the warriors, and placed in the very thickest of the fight, where the woman remains, inspiring and encouraging them by her songs and her exhortations. At the conclusion of the battle, whoever has fought the best comes to her, and with his sabre cuts through all the legs of the unfortunate camel, when of course the woman is precipitated to the ground. If this valiant man is one of her own people she is his lawful prize and well-earned wife; but if the enemy are the conquerors she is taken away by them, and must afterwards be ransomed. A married woman is very rarely selected, never but when an unmarried girl cannot be found sufficiently courageous and spirited; but this is very seldom the case. While she is thus placed on the field of battle, the rest of the women guard the tents, assisting in the fight as much as possible with stones, which they are most expert in throwing. If their enemies are the conquerors, they are quickly expelled, and their tents plundered and stripped of everything in a moment; but if their own people win the fight, the women instantly rush out to the tents of the defeated and strip them; it is the women always who are employed as plunderers of the tents.

When the warrior returns from a distant fight, it is the invariable custom that his own tent is the last he comes to, and in this tent the wife must remain: brothers, sisters, every one in the encampment goes out to meet him, but the wife must await the meeting with her husband till all the others have seen him. It is sometimes a hard rule to keep, for there is much love among them; but any deviation from it would be considered a great breach of propriety.

When a woman is newly married, she is, a few days after, dressed out in her best attire, with all her richest ornaments, and taken round by her husband to visit every tent in the tribe, or at least in the encampment, in turn. She has to drink coffee with every one, in token of their friendliness and acceptance of her as a wife among them. Nor is the choice of a wife quite as simple an affair among them as we are apt to imagine. The Anazehs are exceedingly proud, and particular to an extreme degree about descent and pedigree. The rank of husband and wife must be equal; and if marriage with a stranger is in question, there is as much search and inquiry made about the age of the family and the pureness of her descent as in the case of any Spanish grandee; and if every step in the pedigree is not satisfactorily ascertained, the engagement is broken off. We saw one girl at Tadmor, who was really extremely pretty, with soft sweet eyes and long black hair reaching to the ground. She was immensely admired by and spoken of among the Bedoueens who frequented the town; she was of a good station among her own people, and not a word had ever been whispered against her,—but she belonged to a tribe which the proud Anazehs consider inferior to their own, and not a man among them would think of marrying her. The true-blooded Bedoueen, in fact, values no one but one of themselves; and to marry a woman not a Bedoueen, is considered a grave dishonour, and expulsion from the tribe is almost invariably the consequence; moreover a Bedoueen man of a high tribe, such as the Anazehs and Shemmaars, &c., would think himself utterly degraded if he condescended to dishonour a woman of any other race, blood, or religion but his own; stranger women, prisoners in their hands, would be made to labour and possibly hardly treated, but they would be safe to the last from dishonour or insult. The real Bedoueens are not in the least affected by any display of dress, or ornaments, or riches, or rank in any one out of their own tribes. We were told of a Pacha who had charge of some Government negotiations with one of the more northern tribes, who was exceedingly surprised that no one, but those commissioned to deal with him, had the curiosity to come out and look at him. He had taken great pains to attire himself grandly, and to have his standing and rank duly blazoned forth among them; but he had the mortification of finding they did not care one jot about it at all, or value it in the least.

The most flattering description a Bedoueen can give of a woman, is that "she has hair like a mare's tail," and "a neck like a camel's." We wished to have heard more of their love-songs, but translation is very difficult in Arab songs, where much depends upon the play of words, and even of letters; and it is scarcely possible for any foreigners, however fluent in the language, to enter into the beauties of the verses; but they are all extremely fond of poetry, and we used to like to listen to them, sitting round their fire every evening, reciting and singing song after song, while one of the party ground coffee in a mortar, beating time, as all expert coffee pounders do, with the pestle, in a tuneful cadence. Many a night we went to sleep to that pretty, quiet music. They have as many love-songs as war-songs, and often they recount the exploits and describe the beauties of a favourite mare, sometimes of a camel; but there is never anything coarse in their songs, as, almost always, in the songs of Egypt; nor even in the talk of the men among themselves, as they sit chatting together, is there ever a word which a woman need blush to hear.

Unfaithfulness on the part of a wife is immediately and invariably punished by death; her head is cut off, if not by her husband, by her father or brother; her crime is looked on as the dishonour of her whole house and family, and by them must be wiped out.

The Anazeh women have not good tempers, and the men do not consider them patient or gentle enough to be fit to milk the dear and precious camels; this office is, therefore, always performed by the men. But they are allowed to ride them, and are most expert and fearless in doing so: it is very pretty to see them mount, which they are accustomed to do without stopping the camel; they place one arm on his neck, which he bends down as he walks along, and then, resting one foot for a second on his knee as he crooks it forward, they spring up standing on his neck, and so get into their places, the camel assisting them with a little jerk for the second jump; they are quite at ease when mounted, and think nothing of standing upright on his back, settling their children in the howdahs as he strides along. We could not hear that they had medicine of any kind for the camels when sick; and all they do in cases of sores is to burn the flesh round the sore with a hot iron,—an operation we were twice obliged to witness, to our own sorrow.

The dress of the Anazeh women consists of a long robe or chemise of dark blue cotton, reaching from the throat to the feet, and confined by a belt of embroidered leather; over this a kumbaz or pelisse of some bright colour in silk or cotton, according to the wealth of the wearer; yellow leather boots if she is rich, and as handsome a necklace of varieties of things strung together as she can obtain; over this a mash'lah of white or striped camel's-hair cloth, which must, as well as her kumbaz and chemise, be long enough to hide her feet, and the sleeves of the blue chemise must also be long enough to trail on the ground behind her; she ties up the ends when busy. On her head she wears, if she is rich, triangular gold ornaments hung at each side of her face, with from ten to twenty short gold chains and coins depending from them; long ear-rings, and, in "full dress," a nose-ring, generally of turquoise; her veil, called the shembar, which is placed across her face close under her eyes, and reaches to her knee, is of dark brown crape, and she wears a gay silk kefiyeh over it, bound with a rope of dyed camel's hair prettily twisted up. Zenobia is a common name among them to this day; they pronounce it Zenobēeah, which is said to be the original pronunciation. They have mostly black hair, but the lighter and redder it is, of course the more it is admired, and they are always washing it with henna to give it a red tinge. They use kho'hl on the eyes, and all the Bedoueen men use it also; it is considered a great preservative in the glaring sun, and I certainly found it very cool and pleasant on the lids, keeping them from blisters. If a Bedoueen woman appeared without kho'hl on her eyes, she would be thought as untidy and undressed as an Englishwoman without shoes, and they always have a little bottle containing the kho'hl close at hand*: there is a great knack in putting it on; the eyelids are closed lightly upon the freshly-blackened pin, which is drawn quickly from between them, blacking the edges of both lids at the same moment. The use of kho'hl has been always general in the East: Herod the Great, we are told, painted his eyes with kho'hl, and also dyed his beard and hair with henna; but it was considered very effeminate, and St. Cyprian indignantly denounces it as "the devil's grease."

They are very much afraid of the "evil eye," and the women wear certain round stones hung to their waistbands to preserve them from such a misfortune. They have generally a number of silver bracelets, which come from Baghdad, and the name of their husband is invariably tattooed upon the back of the left hand. A line upon the temples and the chin is all the face-tattooing in which they usually indulge; and they express great surprise at our dislike to it, as their idea is that it imitates the blue veins showing through the skin, and is therefore a natural ornament.

* Keren-happuch, the name of one of the beautiful daughters with whom Job was rewarded for his patience, is the Hebrew word for the little bottle containing the kho'hl.

There was an old hag of a woman at Tadmor, who was much considered by the townspeople, on account of her having twice made the pilgrimage to Mekka; she was in consequence called Hajji Elleerieh—but we called her “Meg Merrilies!” She was the greatest chatterbox woman could be, and had quantities of legends and stories to relate. She was a very successful curiosity-finder, and we used to take her out with us sometimes, when we went hunting along the ground where the ancient houses had stood, in hopes of finding coins, bits of porcelain and glass, &c. One day, when she saw me busy cleaning a pretty little pebble I had found, she began with, “Oh, lady! I have found something much prettier than that; it must needs be a stone belonging to some *jinn*s, for I never saw anything like it before.” She would not for a long time tell us any more about the wonderful stone; she said she was afraid, and she knew we should not believe her if she told us all she had seen: however, after a whole day’s coaxing and flattering, she told us that she had been out, one day, among the ruins of Zenobia’s Palace, not long before, about mid-day, when, the sun being very hot, she sat down by a low wall to rest; presently she heard the hissing of serpents close to her, and turning her head to look over the wall, she saw, at a few yards off, two serpents fighting; their heads were curved far back, as their bodies glided and wriggled about, facing each other; and every now and then they would dart like lightning one at the other, each trying to seize his enemy’s head. At last one gave the other a mortal bite, and he fell prostrate and bleeding on the sand. Then she made a noise, and the victor glided frightened away, while she went to look at the dead snake, curious to see for what they had been fighting. And lo! out of his mouth came the apple of discord — this little white stone! and she opened her hand, and showed us a large, round pearl; a costly one in any place, but doubly valuable in my eyes with this marvellous tale attached to it, and, above all, for having been picked up in Zenobia's Palace. The Bedoueens did not know it was a jewel, nor had any of them ever seen a pearl before; and as it is too fine a pearl to have belonged to any traveller passing by, I am morally convinced, and always shall be, that this identical pearl was dropped off the necklace of the beautiful Zenobia herself, just before she left Palmyra — for ever! I need not say that we bought the pearl. The Sheikh said that, although the old woman was a great rhodomontader, he did not think the story of the serpents untrue; it was not a story that she would have invented, and he had himself more than once seen serpents fighting in the manner she described for some such article as a bit of stone.

One of the gentlemen of our party was anxious to get up to the fine Saracenic castle which overlooks the town, and Meg Merrilies offered to show him the way; so one afternoon they set off together by a path that she assured him was quite feasible: she missed it, however, and after two or three hours' walk they arrived at the foot of an almost perpendicular cliff. She wanted to go back, but he insisted on going on, and, taking off his shoes, he managed, being an expert Alpine climber, to ascend the rock. She scrambled after him by another way, a long time after, holding on with her long hands which were like eagle's claws. He entered by a loop-hole, for, though the castle is nearly quite perfect, the drawbridge and all legitimate entrance is destroyed.

He described it as the gloomiest castle he had ever seen, with numerous vaulted chambers and extensive dungeons, occupying a very strong position. Meg Merrilies most unwillingly followed him, and kept on exhorting and conjuring him "not to be afraid of the jinns," of whom she was herself evidently in mortal terror, and when she came down she gave us a most lively account of all the trouble she had had in persuading him to go on, describing his misery and dread of the awful jinns, and all she had done to soothe and comfort him! She would stop on the way down the mountain continually to gather the potash plant, and when she had got a good bundle in her veil, she addressed him with, "Oh, young man, in the flower of thy blooming youth! carry this load on thy back for me, for thou art young and strong, and I am old,—and then I will perhaps give thee part of the profits of my bundle!" He good-naturedly helped her, but her version of the story to us was, that he was so completely worn out with fatigue and terror that she was obliged to carry the "welled" * (who is about six feet high) on her back for a long distance. To this castle, in seasons of drought, the people of Tadmor go in grand procession, dressed in their best clothes, and when there they sacrifice a lamb, and offer up prayers for rain.

Our promised five days had expired, but most reluctant were we to leave the enchanting spot; every day new points of view were to be seen, other tombs to be examined, and fresh sketches to be taken; so we made a joint petition in due form to our good Sheikh for leave to stay longer; he was, as usual, full of kind desire to accede to our wishes. The tribe was indeed gone, but he had heard of nothing but peace round the place, and if we liked to stay we might do so as far as he was concerned; but the matter was more difficult with the Argeels,—they earned more per day in Damascus than we gave them, and, the time of our contract having expired, they wanted to go back. We made them a handsome present, however, to be divided among them, as well as ten piasters a day for the food of each camel, and they agreed to stay a few days more.

* "Young man."

Our English ideas of the Desert — the expression we use for the ne plus ultra of all that is horrible — are so vague and so unlike the truth, that I despair of making any one understand by words alone the exceeding and glorious beauty of the scene around us. At home we think of the Desert like a white sea of gloomy though glaring barrenness*, a wearying monotony of ugliness; instead of which no scene in nature can be clothed in more brilliant, more varied, or more quickly changing colours. In the narrow space between the foreground and the horizon, when laid down on paper, no brush could ever be made to lay in the countless streak after streak of colours filling up that space; in despair of catching them by any other means, I have scribbled down upon the margins of my drawings a score of descriptions of the view at that moment before me,—such as this, beginning with the foreground :—"Brown, dark red, violet, lilac, gold, rose, crimson, pale green, orange, indigo-blue, sky-blue;" these all blending into delicious, strange, incalculable harmonies, ever and ever changing, —every effect seemed the most beautiful, and one

* Many of the Deserts of Africa are, I believe, like this: where the sand is loose, and consequently wind-blown, of course nothing can grow; in the Great Desert the sand binds, and much of the varied colouring is owing to the appearance of the thorns, &c., growing upon it.

wished it to last for ever, — when, in another two minutes, all would be changed into something so much lovelier still, one never knew whether one admired or wondered the most. Many and many a time, anxious though I was to draw all I could, my pencil stood still in my hand while I was engrossed in watching the rapid and beautiful changes which no brush could copy and no tongue describe. Then the mountains that approach Tadmor on one side, would shine out in shades of violet, purple, and a delicate misty lilac, of such brilliant hues that one felt startled at the sight; and, late in the day, the Ruins used to look literally like things built of pearls set in burnished gold, as they stood against the background of wine-empurpled mountains, or, as sometimes, on one of the fine dark stormy evenings we had, against a sky of deep sapphire blue, unlightened by the sunshine which touched accidentally on their fair whiteness only; it seemed, indeed, to my fancy, as if the Ruins sometimes, in the very intensity of their glowing colours, found a silent voice, unheard by the ear, but understood by the mind that listened to their “eloquent teachings,” — as if they were the clear upper notes, the sweet treble of the deep harmony evoked all around in the sublime colouring of Nature. Holy and noble indeed are these colours, which God has given to clothe and invest his creation: “of all God’s gifts to the sight of man, the holiest, the most divine, the most solemn,”* and they who see the fair things in the Desert in their most radiant brilliancy, as though they were fresher there from the Creator’s hand than in any other place, may well fancy with me that one heard them saying

* Ruskin.

"Though heedless man might quite forget Thy praise,
We praised Thee; and at rise and set of sun
Did we assemble duly, and intone
A choral hymn that all the lands might hear. . . .
We, the Seven Daughters of the Light, to praise Thee, Light of Light! Thee, God of very God!" *

I often thought too of the legend, which may be truth, of how Solomon built a palace here for the daughter of Pionkh, King of Egypt, who sighed for her native deserts even among the fair palaces and gardens round about the hill of Zion, and how she dwelt here in the Desert, so like and yet so unlike her own grand, wild, and impressive wilderness of sand; the one grand in barrenness and desolation, the other sublime in beauty and loveliness. The sky, indeed, was the same over both — unclouded and serene, and with that most exquisitely lovely hue that ever earth has seen; and what must not that sky have been to the men of those early days, with simple minds but high thoughts, who, intimately persuaded that directly behind its slight though ever undrawn veil Jehovah and all His angels were assembled in awful majesty, "looked upon every cloud that passed as literally the chariot of an angel, and every ray of the morning and the evening as streaming from the throne of God"!† No wonder, in truth, that they worshipped that sun, from whose light and warmth all generation seemed to proceed, as God, or at least the chief token of God; more wonder if they had not done so; and no wonder either that, when they raised such buildings to His honour, and filled them with the shining gold and the ivory, and the gems and the incense, and all that could intoxicate and enchant the senses, the rough and rude-minded son of the Desert asked no question and wondered no more, but fell prostrate in awe-struck adoration before the shrine of Baal !

* Maynard.

† Ruskin.

Here, too, most probably came the Magians of old, passionately craving after and yearning for light — a light more tangible and nearer to their hearts than the purely spiritual religion they had been taught to follow — with their pulses beating high, and their hearts big with expectation and hope, which the Divine spark was working out within them, as they followed the Star which their science had told them must have brought a message to them — a high and holy and solemn messenger, which they reverently followed, not pausing in their sacred journey even at this famed and beauteous shrine ; but, laden with the best that they had, the poor outward symbols of that which was better within, they followed steadily on till the beautiful angel of the Lord (as they in their simple creed believed that Star to be) stopped above the low hills of Judæa, and, with the unquestioning, childlike humility of the true philosopher, they, the great priests, the Wise Men of the East, knelt down with exceeding joy before the little Child, and recognised in Him the Divine Man, the day-spring of a new and brighter day, which should give light, not to the children of Abraham only, but to all those who “sat in darkness and in the shadow of death,” and would “guide their feet into the way of peace.”

M. Haag's beautiful sketches proceeded with great rapidity: the people molested him very little, and I am certain some of those who did see him at work, believed that his drawings were done by magic. It was a great thing to get out of the way of the rude curiosity of the townspeople ; for though we always had a man of the town or one of the Argeels for our protection wherever we went, they bored us dreadfully whenever we were within reach. My companion was generally a fine young Bedoueen, so very black, but so erect and handsome, that we called him "Black Adonis." He used to lie on the sand close to me while I drew, twisting up and smoking cigarettes; but after a day or two he began to be interested in my performances, and got nearer and nearer: at last I was very much amused to find him gazing intently over my shoulder, looking up when I did, and watching my pencil as it moved. I doubted that he really understood the picture, and, to prove him, I made a long line which did not exist in nature, when a deep grunt just at my ear startled me into a sense of my error: I rubbed it out, and was rewarded with a "taïb, taïb;" and for the next three hours that young savage sat there, forgetting to smoke, looking on with the deepest attention, keeping up a running accompaniment of grunts, and rebuking me with an indignant "la, la" (no, no), when I put in a figure that I had seen sitting there the day before, but which was not there now. At last I gave him a bit of paper and a pencil, and said "ente amel soora" (you make a picture), — he burst into a long, low, grave chuckle, and said "Anazeh fingers too big;" but we were fast friends ever after: and I heard him relating my invitation to his fingers, with much gusto, that night round the evening fire.

One afternoon my sister and I went out together, with only the guide, a Tadmor man, to carry our sketch-books, and stationed ourselves at the Temple of the King's Mother. Beyond this neither man nor woman of the town would go alone after dusk; they said the place was full of jinns,—but the jinns were of flesh and blood: stray Bedoueens of small tribes might be, and were almost always, lurking about to plunder any thing or person they could find, and they were gentlemen not to be lightly adventured with. We had plenty of time, as we thought, before us, and we settled quickly to work, my sister choosing a fallen capital for her seat, which the guide was moving a little into position, when a serpent of deadly venom darted out from behind it, with head erect and hissing tongue: fortunately the guide had a huge stone in his hand at the moment, and the creature was crushed at once. The man said it was an evil omen; but he lay down beside us, and was soon fast asleep, and we sat drawing, and never looking round, till, all of a sudden, we saw two mounted Bedouens not very far from us, and coming in the direction from Baghdad! It was rather a startling sight at this distance from protection, and we wakened the man, who immediately seemed in an awful fright, and hid himself in the inside of the Temple. It was too late to hide, we knew, and moving would be more likely to attract their keen eyes than keeping still; but I am free to confess that for once my heart did beat uncommonly quickly (though we both assured each other there was no danger whatever), remembering very well that we were two miles from our people, and that the sun was fast sinking behind the mountain. But, to our immense relief, the men passed on without seeing us, and as they skirted the town, and turned down towards our camp, the guide pronounced them Anazehs.

So they proved to be, as we found when we got back to the camp, and bad news they brought, viz. that they had seen hostile Arabs on the way—at some distance, indeed, but possibly scenting us from afar. So the Sheikh issued his decree at once, that off we must go at sunrise the next morning. We ate our last dinner, much to the joy of the Tadmorites, who had sent down a formal message that morning to the camp, saying that they did hope we would soon "move on," for that we had eaten nearly every cock, old and young, in the town, and they could not supply us with any more! we were, indeed, aware we had eaten the old cocks, but were all unconscious of having ever tasted a young one. So we had to make the best of our departure, and to believe it was time to leave: we were all feeling ill and languid, from the heat, our overtaxed strength, the sulphur, and the carrion; and the camels were evidently getting weak from want of proper food. A centipede had emerged from under the pillow of one of the gentlemen the night before, and a deadly serpent been killed in the mash'lah of one of the dragomans on the same day. The precious sketches were packed up, we made our last notes by starlight, filled the saddle-bags, took a farewell bathe in the sulphur stream, and lay down for our last sleep in the air of the warm sulphur-scented stream.

PART III.—THE RETURN.

THOUGH brightly still shone down the moon's soft ray
Upon the hard rough pillows where we lay,
The wary Bedouen watched her orb decline,
And waked the sleeping camp from dreams divine.
Then, one by one, each prostrate figure rose,
Around his head the gay kefiyeh throws,
And as the bright light reddened into morn,
Crimsoning the pomegranate bud the night had born,
We bade adieu to that strange resting-place,
And tow'rd the West again we turned our face.

But first our way we slowly paced beside The warm-breath'd stream, where maid and stripling tried
'Mid thirsty beasts the hideous skins to fill;
And by the mighty Temple Wall, where still
The lingering shades in cool grey masses hung,
And gazed aloft, where early sunbeams flung
Their light upon the carven columns tall
Which tower up above the huge, grand wall,—
Across the plain, by many a look delayed,
We passed beside the long, long Colonnade,—
All solemnly serene those pillars stand,
As some fair forms uprisen from the sand,
Which, ever gathering round their long-hid feet,
Pays thus with jealous care its homage meet.

There, lost in boundless blue infinitude,
The Desert lies with every colour hued,
Bright orange streaked with grey and glowing red,
Then violet soft o'er all the distance shed,
While, over all, the last faint shades of night
Dispersed before the morn's triumphant light.
And there the Temple, all her grace displayed
By bright Hyperion's first and latest rays,
Gives back the mute response of golden praise
Which pitying Time upon her stones hath laid !

Then past the stone heaps, once the Palace fair
Of her whose feet in jewelled sandals bare
To worship proud within that glorious fane —
Imperial Princess of the Desert plain !

Oh! slowly then we clomb the barrier hill,
Where stand a hundred tombs of ancient story,
With one long gaze regretful eyes to fill—Fit place of farewell to Palmyra's glory!

Here stood the sad dethroned Queen, and wrung Despairing hands where golden fetters clung,— Here stood to upbraid those mountains stern and great
She deemed sure guardians from the younger world,—
Here gazed upon the splendid home where late
The widowed Queen her own proud banners furled,—
Now—o'er Palmyra, Roman eagles wave,—
Her Temple courts profaned—her Queen, a slave!

But yet, I trow the anguish of that gaze,
Dwelt less upon the pride of brighter days,
Than on the Tombs—now of their treasures reft—
Where thrice four hundred years of honour slept;
And half in envy burned as she descried
The Tomb of that first Queen—th' Egyptian Bride, (For whose delight, 'tis said King Solomon raised
This home, more lovely far than that she praised On mighty Egypt's shore of still unrivalled fame);
And thought how calm she slept—untouched by shame,—
With those proud hearts that Death alone could thrall—Closed eyes that wept not for their Daughter's fall!

'Tis said Zenobia made another home,
By Tiber's banks, in stern ungrateful Rome,
That on her brow—divinely calm—there reigned
The impress of serenest peace unfeigned:
Not such the mark that guilt or shame confers,— Nor chains nor fetters could that soul degrade,— Erect, she bore the vassal's sign—and made
The shame Aurelian's—and the triumph hers!
Yet oft, I ween, when Evening's golden haze,
In clouds of sunlight wrapped her wondering gaze,
Rome's cruel walls no more the heart enthralled,
By memories fond to that loved home recalled;
Beneath the shade of waving palms she dwelt,
Before Apollo's sacred shrine she knelt,
Her homage paid as fancy saw again

The crimson glory flood the Desert plain,
 The pearly columns shine with roseate hue
 Against the violet hills and deepening blue,
 And cried, "What though my voice no more I raise,
 This ceaseless beauty offers up glad praise!"

And we too turned away—our last look bent
 On those old Tombs,—while, like a bright dream spent,
 The wild, free life upon the Desert plain,
 The beauteous and sublime infinitude,
 The gorgeous-coloured ocean, rainbow-hued,
 Those rosy Temples with their golden stain,
 All lovely things we shall not see again,—
 Sunk down behind the barrier hill, which closed
 From view the living Tomb where calm reposed,
 In marble letters writ upon the sand,
 The dim but yet proud story of the land:—
 And happier far than they who here adored
 Mysterious gods, and their dark aid implored,
 We lifted up our hearts in mute appeal,
 To that true Son of God Whose righteous Heel
 Hath trodden down the Serpent's sinful head,
 O'er Death's dark shades His healing radiance shed,
 And spread from north to south, from east to west,
 The Faith which makes both Jew and Gentile blest!

Then passed we to a narrow vale, among Dark violet mountains, where light mist-wreaths clung, Gazelles and jerboas bounding through the thorn
 Brush off the sparkling dew-drops of the morn,
 And, dancing lightly on the path, the bird,
 The camel-lover's* little note is heard.
 So slowly paced the camels one by one,
 So, one by one, each long, slow step was done,
 Each measured footfall's swinging cadence sung,
 As higher sunbeams shortened shadows flung:
 The wild fierce rays seemed scorching every brain
 As all around they scorched the barren plain;

* Habeebee el gemmal, the lover of the camel: a little black and white bird, that is always dancing on the path, about a yard before the camel, as he paces along, especially in the morning.

And then on either hand th' unbroken walls
Of purple crags grew streaked with shades of red,
And darkening browns upon the lilacs spread,
As blazing up the midday sunshine falls.

And still the same slow step went calmly on,
And, one by one, th' unmarked hours were gone,
Till, blessed sight! blue waters coolly lave
The purple mountains' feet with rippling wave,
Delicious creeks and little bays appear,
And seem our hot and burning eyes to cheer,
And all th' horizon gleams with shining lakes —
When lo! they quickly vanish like the flakes
Of snow that fall beneath an April sky, —
And all the Desert seems more hot, more dry; —

At last, the boundless, unflecked dome of blue Deepens behind us into sapphire hue
While radiant westerling floods of brightest gold
In warm embrace sweet rosy clouds enfold:
Dark hues of plum upon the mountains shed,
And on the Desert plain a ruddy sea is spread O'er which the long blue shadows fleetly fly;
Then darkening clouds were all around unfurled,
And sank the sun into another world,
Whence long, long after o'er the eastern sky
Sweet pictures of bright pink and gold he flung —
The evening echoes of the hymn he sung
At break of day, — like Farewells floating back
From lips unseen upon a winding track.

A moment on the soft, warm sand we lay,
And drank the fragrant cup and longed to stay,
But as the deepening night around us came
A distant spark revealed a hostile flame,
And quickly quenched was ours, and we had gone
With that slow footstep calmly striding on,
And aught but whispered tones the Sheikh forbade,
Lest we by tell-tale winds should be betrayed.

For now the night-breeze fluttered o'er the plain, —
Now fragrant with sweet-scented herbs it came —
Now whistling with a hard and rustling tone —
Now sighing with a low and tender moan, —

Anon a swift and savage gust would rise,
 And with a solemn fury sweep the skies :
 Then hush—and softly clinging round the face
 A sweet and balmy breeze with loving grace
 Would breathe—most like a cloud of rosy hue, Alone and matchless in a heaven of blue ;
 Or like the memory bright of one sweet day,
 Shining throughout the weary life-long way.

So with the same long step we glided on,
 And, one by one, th' unmarked hours had gone,—
 No change came o'er the darkened way,
 Save where the stars moved on in bright array,
 Or flung themselves athwart the gleaming night,
 And fell with glittering glances out of sight.
 So, ever "ohne Hast und ohne Rast,"
 Till since the dawn full twenty hours had past,
 And by the Robber's Tower we glided fast,
 Lest lurking Bedoueen the troop descry,—
 When, suddenly, the red Moon leaped on high,
 And, in black masses mingled on the ground,
 The silvery beams our shadows all confound,— Dismayed we thought discovery sure at hand,
 And listened for the Arab's rough command ;
 But all around unbroken silence spread,
 And nought disturbed us as we onward sped ;
 One enemy alone appeared, unsought,
 With whom we each with painful efforts fought,
 While every hour he more victorious grew,— Sweet Sleep ! unwelcome then, but friend most true !
 The pitying Sheikh the camels bade to kneel,
 That we a hasty hour of rest might steal,
 And in a shallow wady on the ground
 All soon were wrapped in dreamless sleep profound.

While there we lay and wearily reposed,
 Th' eternal eye of every star was closed,
 And night's cold grey had turned to ruddy morn
 When we awaked to find the Desert thorn
 Was bending o'er our heads its little arch,—
 Then hastily we rose—resumed our march,
 And chased our own blue shadows flung before
 The rising ray,—no living thing moved o'er

Th' unchanging yellow sand, till formless shade
And quivering air the midday hour betrayed ;
When lo ! a cloud of moving dust appears,
And to our little band it quickly nears,
Now circling round in front and flank,
Then swerving off as though they shrank
With pity from our little troop,
Then turning back with sudden swoop,
In narrowing circles wheeling round,
And hoofs scarce lighting on the ground,
With tightened bit and poised lance,
With savage shriek and fiery glance,
With angry words and hostile mien,
On, on, they came, wild Bedouen !
Our guns were fired — and quickly they Reined up, — and then we guessed the play
Which welcomed us in Desert style to share Their homely shelter from the scorching glare :
With kindly toil they led our beasts to drink
Delicious draughts within the lakelet's brink, —
This done, our steps to Kuryeteen we pressed,
And in the spacious khan at last found rest.

We were not destined to find much repose at Kuryeteen, as we were obliged to keep in the shelter of the guest-room from the heat of the sun, and no entreaties, coaxings, persuasions, objurgations, or anything else could keep the people out of the room. They made us very comfortable upon cushions and mattresses ; but, seating themselves beside us, if we closed our weary eyes for one moment, a finger stole up to feel our cheeks, or stroke our hair, or pulled at our dresses to see how they were made : so we gave up trying to sleep, and retired into another room for the still better refreshment of a good bath ; our dragoman standing outside the door en garde, about forty or fifty women crowding round him and abusing him for keeping them out and preventing their climbing up to the windows to look at us. "I tell you the sitts are bathing!"

"E wullah! isn't that what we want to see?" And at last they tried to break open the door. We then returned to the guest-chamber, where fresh and fresh relays of people came in to inspect us as we lay on our cushions; my sister patiently answered as many of their questions as she understood, while I amused myself with writing the foregoing lines, as a history of our return ride.

Towards sunset they brought us a banquet of meat and rice in various shapes, with vegetable-marrow and lentils, ending with a huge dish of fine dates stewed in butter, or rather oil, smoking hot; very good it was, but one could eat but a very little of it. It was rather a picturesque scene, for the room was a large one, and the whole town seemed crowded in to inspect the Franks feeding. The dinner was placed on the ground, and lighted up by two brass candelabras, each of them five feet high and handsomely made, which threw bright lights upon the swarthy faces ranged around us, with the many-coloured kefiyehs of the men, and the gold ornaments of the women. Some of the men were very handsome; and they were highly delighted when M. Haag made a hasty sketch of one or two.

We mounted as soon as it was dark, a large caravan of camels and donkeys accompanying us out of the town, as they had asked permission to benefit by the Sheikh's escort. The donkeys seemed like so many mice running beside the camels, but the long strings of baggage camels, tied in dozens and scores, were very troublesome, for our dromedaries were continually getting entangled among them; and as there was no moon and the night was very dark they fell very often. It was so cold by midnight that, coming after our many sleepless hours, we were all continually falling asleep, and at last the whole party got down to walk, so the Sheikh said we had better have tea, and we lit the fire, and then Sheikh, Argeels, and all went fast asleep, and we slept till near sunrise, to the Sheikh's great annoyance, for the night's halt had been quite unintentional, but a very great relief.

Our journey back was not so pleasant as the journey there, for the camels were so weak they would lag, and we had the sun nearly all day in our eyes, which is much harder to bear than when it is behind one; moreover we were ourselves pretty well tired out. But we had a lovely view all day of the snowy mountain range reaching up to Homs, a beautiful feature in a Desert view: the snow had fallen while we were at Tadmor, but, curiously enough, although it had been very thick on Hermon as we left Damascus, it seemed to have almost quite melted away as we returned. We were joined in the course of the morning by an armed Arab, mounted on horseback, who would answer no question as to where he was going, or to what Tribe he belonged. The Sheikh looked grave, and after some time offered him a piece of the bread he was himself eating, but the Arab declined it—and there could not be a more unfriendly sign. After an hour or two the Arab was suddenly missed from among us, and the Sheikh became anxious, still more so when at dusk he was descried at a distance waiting for us with two other Arabs,—of course there might be two dozen concealed. So we were desired to close in a compact body and to ride on quickly, the Sheikh advancing in front, and we got a little excited, and some of us hoped to see a little "fun;" when, on reaching the men, the Arab's companions turned out to be two of our own escort, who had ridden on while we had delayed to let our camels feed on some tamarisk bushes we had happened to find: the stranger wished us good-bye soon after. There is no doubt that he intended mischief, but if he belonged to a Ghūzoo, he probably told them we were too strong a party to attack; and so ended our last attempt at an adventure.

We rested that afternoon at Atny, and, starting again when the moon got up, mistook our way into Jerood, and got into an encampment of Bedoueen tents, setting all the dogs into a chorus of furious howls; a great annoyance, for they run at and bite your camel's legs, and make him wrathful. The camels stumbled and fell a great deal, but the night work was pleasanter than the very hot days; indeed, I always enjoyed the night journeys, both in the Desert and in Syria (when I was not sleepy), almost as much as those of the bright-coloured day. The night was so clear and light, and the sky so blue instead of black, that one can still see something of the scenery, although the contrasts of the silver moonlight and the densely black shadows are deceptive: and then one can think so quietly and uninteruptedly, with one's head cool, and one's eyes unscorched, while truly there was always food for thought around one, above all in the full, softly-glowing, God-created lamps of Night that shone in the sky. In the far East it is easier than in our gloomy skies to understand how naturally the men of old turned to them for worship; and how they yearned for the changeless purity and Eternal Order they saw there and nowhere else. Often too, I thought of the child with his pure heart so fresh from the Hands of God that he saw Him everywhere, and asked if the stars were not "gimlet holes to let the glory through," and felt how fully his innocent eyes had seen, in spirit, the glory revealed in their beauty, which, like the miracles, manifested through the simplicity of His human life, the Divine Glory within it, revealing the Light which was already shining in the darkness of the world that comprehended it not.

It is beautiful to look out at any moment of night upon the glowing stars, but you cannot read their meaning clearly, unless, night after night, you have watched "the bright procession" move "down the gleaming arch," till you have seen the whole "celestial army" sweep across an "endless reach of sky," and pass out of our poor human sight to rise in other skies, and till you have learned the bright lesson of the "marshalled brotherhood of souls,"* moving calmly, silently on, held up in the Hand of God the Father of all, "binding" their "sweet influences"† into one harmony, as He permits the souls of some to ride in majesty through the world, and others to shine meekly and dimly, but oh! in His sight not a whit less radiantly. If there was one thing more in my mind than another, by night and by day, in all my long rides through the Desert, it was the oft-repeated words, "Heaven and Earth are full of the Majesty of Thy Glory!"

These are some of the thoughts that occupy one almost unconsciously in the long silent hours of Eastern travelling; and difficult as it is to carry the mind of one's reader along with one in descriptions, and hopeless as it is to paint in words the scenes that met our eyes for theirs, it is really impossible to make them enter into trains of thought that arise from the accidents of the atmosphere and the silence and the beauty around one.

We found the Bourghaz pass perfectly stifling, and

* Buchanan Read.

† Job xxxviii. 31.

were thankful that the good Sheikh ordained a rest, for the sake of the camels, under the shade of the thick lofty trees about Doumah, which had seemed hopelessly far off. My sister's camel, the dear Simri, had lagged latterly very much, and she dismounted, hoping thus to relieve the tired beast, but within a few yards of Doumah the poor thing knelt down on the road side, and lay there till she died two days after. We had a most refreshing meal of grapes and delicious fresh lebben (sour milk) under the trees, before we remounted; my sister was given a very fine white dromedary, and we all set off racing each other at a brisk trot.

We had a grand entry into Damascus; about two hours' distance from the town we met the beautiful and almost priceless mares of the Sheikh, out exercising, and he immediately mounted his favourite and galloped wildly and gaily all round the cavalcade. The dromedaries knew very well how near they were to home, and they went merrily along while the Argeels brushed them up, re-arranged their own kefiyehs, and then burst out into choruses of songs, screaming and shouting, and some of them standing up and dancing on the camels' backs amid peals of laughter, while the Darabooka played unceasing rub-a-dubs of the noisiest description. Very merry and bright it was; the road was lively with people, to whom the astonishing fact of our long stay at Tadmor was again and again related, and a thousand welcomes were shouted to Sheikh Miguel as one after another recognised him. Most cool, refreshing, and delightful did the green trees overhanging the rough paths, the bright gardens, and thousand rushing streamlets appear to our Desert-used eyes. I need not say how still more welcome the excellent hôtel beds felt to our wearied bodies as we sank to sleep to the music of the fountain in our room, after fifteen days' absence. But I may add that, for my own part, I would willingly undergo twice the fatigue again to revisit that magnificently lovely Tadmor.

𐤆𐤃𐤌𐤓

ZENOBLA. (Written in Palmyrene characters.)

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

LONDON
PRINTED BY SPOTTISWOODE AND CO.
NEW-STREET SQUARE